sell its excess production; Whereas, the Sugar Act of 1937, which, in defining "liquid sugar," expressly excludes "the sirup of cane juice produced from sugarcane grown in the continental United States," produces the effect of not charging against the quotas of Louisiana and Florida the sirup manufactured in those States, while the sirup produced in Puerto Rico is charged against the quota of this country; and those States are free to turn into sirup any cane in excess of their fixed sugar quotas, while Puerto Rico is denied the right

SECURITY OF CITIZENSHIP-DECISION OF SUPREME COURT

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, a very few days ago a most interesting opinion was written by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes and adopted as the law of the land by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This decision settles the anxiety of those interested in maintaining a security of citizenship for our people. It is scarcely credible that this country would take lightly the vested birthright of citizenship which I am sure our Constitution, wisely interpreted, grants.

I have always felt so strongly the point of view now adopted by the Court that on two occasions I spoke publicly, once in Washington and once in New York, some months ago, urging that our State and Justice Departments be prevailed upon to appreciate the full significance of citizenship by place of birth as granted as an unwavering right in our Constitution.

Twice I addressed my thoughts in similar planes to the State and the Justice Departments, and found my views in seeming irreconcilable conflict with theirs, at least to the extreme extent to which I expressed my regard for place of birth as a stable and unshakable foundation of United States citizenship.

Anyone who is thoughtful about tendencies of government throughout the world to turn to the citizenship based upon blood idea will see the importance of this decision on American democracy.

Following is a list of those who participated in the case:

Present: The Chief Justice, Associate Justices McReynolds, Butler, Stone, Roberts, Black, Reed, and Frankfurter (Mr. Justice Douglas not then appointed).

Opinion by the Chief Justice announced May 29, 1939.

I now ask unanimous consent that this most gratifying decision be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States. Nos. 454, 455. October term, 1938. 454. Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, and Edward J. Shaughnessy, Acting Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, petitioners, v. Marie Elizabeth Elg. 455. Marie Elizabeth Elg. petitioner, v. Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, and Edward J. Shaughnessy, Acting Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, et al. On writs of certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. May 29, 1939]

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the Court. The question is whether the plaintiff. Marie Elizabeth Elg, who was born in the United States of Swedish parents then naturalized here, has lost her citizenship and is subject to deportation because of her removal during minority to Sweden, it appearing that her parents resumed their citizenship in that country but that she returned here on attaining a majority with intention to remain and to maintain her citizenship in the United States.

Miss Elg was born in Brocklyn, N. Y., on October 2, 1907. parents, who were natives of Sweden, emigrated to the United States sometime prior to 1906 and her father was naturalized here in that year. In 1911 her mother took her to Sweden where she continued to reside until September 7, 1929. Her father went to Sweden in 1922 and has not since returned to the United States. In November 1934 he made a statement before an American consul in Sweden that he had voluntarily expatriated himself for the reason that he did not desire to retain the status of an American citizen and wished to preserve his allegiance to Sweden.

In 1928, shortly before Miss Elg became 21 years of age, she inquired of an American consul in Sweden about returning to the United States and was informed that if she returned after attaining majority she should seek an American passport. In 1929, within 8 months after attaining majority, she obtained an American passport which was issued on the instructions of the Secretary of State. She then returned to the United States, was admitted as a citizen, and has resided in this country ever since.

In April 1935 Miss Elg was notified by the Department of Labor that she was an alien illegally in the United States and was threatened with deportation. Proceedings to effect her deportation have been postponed from time to time. In July 1936 she applied for an American passport but it was refused by the Secretary of State upon the sole ground that he was without authority to issue it because she was not a citizen of the United States.

Thereupon she began this suit against the Secretary of Labor, the Acting Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, and the

Thereupon she began this suit against the Secretary of Labor, the Acting Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, and the Secretary of State to obtain (1) a declaratory judgment that she is a citizen of the United States and entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizenship, and (2) an injunction against the Secretary of Labor and the Commissioner of Immigration restraining them from prosecuting proceedings for her deportation, and (3) an injunction against the Secretary of State from refusing to issue to her a passport upon the ground that she is not a citizen.

The defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, asserting that plaintiff was not a citizen of the United States by virtue of the Naturalization Convention and Protocol of 1869 (proclaimed in 1872) between the United States and Sweden (17 Stat. 809) and the Swedish nationality law, and section 2 of the act of Congress of March 2, 1907 (8 U. S. C. 17). The district court overruled the motion as to the Secretary of Labor and the Commissioner of Immigration and entered a decree declaring that the plaintiff is a native citizen of the United States but directing that the complaint dismissed as to the Secretary of State because of his official discretion in the issue of passports. On cross appeals the court of appeals affirmed the decree (99 F. (2d) 408). Certiorari was granted December 5, 1938.

First. On her birth in New York the plaintiff became a citizen of the United States.

First. On her birth in New York the plaintiff became a citizen of the United States (Civil Rights Act of 1866, 14 Stat. 27; four-teenth amendment, sec. 1; United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 649). In a comprehensive review of the principles and authorities governing the decision in that case—that a child born here of alien parentage becomes a citizen of the United States—the Court adverted to the "inherent right of every independent nation to determine for itself, and according to its own constitution and laws, what classes of persons shall be entitled to its citizenship" (United States v. Wong Kim Ark, supra, p. 668). As municipal law determines how citizenship may be acquired, it follows that persons may have a dual nationality. And the mere fact that the plaintiff may have acquired Swedish citizenship by virtue of the operation of Swedish law, on the resumption of that citizenship by her parents, does not compel the conclusion that she has lost her own citizenship acquired under our law. citizenship acquired under our law. As at birth she became a citizen of the United States, that citizenship must be deemed to continue unless she has been deprived of it through the operation of a treaty or congressional enactment or by her voluntary action in conformity with applicable legal principles.

Second. It has long been a recognized principle in this country that if a child born here is taken during minority to the country of his parents' origin, where his parents resume their former allegiance, he does not thereby lose his citizenship in the United States, provided that on attaining majority he elects to retain that States, provided that on attaining majority he elects to retain that citizenship and to return to the United States to assume its duties.² This principle was clearly stated by Attorney General Edwards Pierrepont in his letter of advice to the Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish, in Steinkauler's case (15 Op. Atty. Gen. 15 (1875)). The facts were these: One Steinkauler, a Prussian subject by birth, emigrated to the United States in 1848, was naturalized in 1854, and in the following year had a son who was born in St. Louis. Four years later Steinkauler returned to Germany, taking this child, and became domiciled at Weisbaden, where they continuously resided. When the son reached the age of 20 years the German Government called upon him to report for military duty, and his father then invoked the intervention of 20 years the German Government called upon him to report for military duty, and his father then invoked the intervention of the American Legation on the ground that his son was a native citizen of the United States. To an inquiry by our Minister, the father declined to give an assurance that the son would return to this country within a reasonable time. On reviewing the pertinent points in the case, including the Naturalization Treaty of 1868 with North Germany, the Attorney General reached the following conclusion: lowing conclusion:

"Young Steinkauler is a native-born American citizen. There is no law of the United States under which his father or any other person can deprive him of his birthright. He can return to America at the age of 21, and in due time, if the people elect, he can become President of the United States; but the father, in accordance with the treaty and the laws, has renounced his American citizenship and his American allegiance and has acquired for himself and his son German citizenship and the rights which it carries, and he must take the burdens as well as the advantages. The son being domiciled with the father and subject advantages. The son being domiciled with the father and subject to him under the law during his minority, and receiving the German protection where he has acquired nationality and declining to give any assurance of ever returning to the United States and claiming his American nationality by residence here, I am of the opinion that he cannot rightly invoke the aid of the Government of the United States to relieve him from military duty in Germany during his minority But I am of opinion that when he reaches the age of 21 years he can then elect whether he will return and take the nationality of his birth with its duties and privileges or retain the nationality acquired by the act of his father. This seems to me to be 'right reason' and I think it is law."

Secretary William M. Evarts, in 1879, in an instruction to our Minister to Germany with respect to the status of the brothers Boisseliers, who were born in the United States of German parentage, said:

entage, said:²

"Their rights rest on the organic law of the United States.

* Their father, it is true, took them to Schleswig when they were quite young, the one 4 and the other 2 years old. They lived there many years, but during all those years they were minors, and during their minority they returned to the United States; and now, when both have attained their majority, they declare for their native allegiance and submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the country where they were born and of which they are native citizens. Under these circumstances this Government cannot recognize any claim to their allegiance or their liability to military service, put forth on the part of Germany, whatever may be the municipal law of Germany under which such claim may be asserted by that Government."

Secretary Evarts gave a similar instruction in 1880 with respect to a native citizen of Danish parentage, who, having been taken abroad at an early age, claimed American citizenship on attaining his majority, saying:

"He lost no time when he attained the age of majority in declar-ing that he claimed the United States as his country and that he considered himself a citizen of the United States. He appears to have adhered to this choice ever since and now declares it to be his intention to return to this country and reside here permanently. His father's political status (whether a citizen of the United States or a Danish subject) has no legal or otherwise material effect on the younger P———s' rights of citizenship."

Secretary Thomas F. Bayard, in answer to an inquiry by the Netherlands Legation whether one born in the United States, of Dutch parents, who during minority had been taken back to the Netherlands by his father, on the latter's resumption of permanent residence there, was an American citizen, answered: *

"But the general view held by this Department is that a naturalized American citizen by abandonment of his allegiance and resiized American citizen by abandonment of his allegiance and residence in this country and a return to the country of his birth, animo manendi, ceases to be a citizen of the United States; and that the minor son of a party described as aforesaid, who was born in the United States during the citizenship there of his father, partakes during his legal infancy of his father's domicile, but upon becoming sui juris has the right to elect his American citizenship, which will be best evidenced by an early return to this country.

"This right so to elect to return to the land of his birth and assume his American citizenship could not, with the acquiescence of this Government, be impaired or interfered with."

In 1906, a memorandum, prepared in the Department of State by its law officer, was sent by the Acting Secretary of State, Robert Bacon, to the German Ambassador as covering "the principles" upon which the Department had acted. In this memorandum it was said." was said:

"Assuming that Alexander Bohn (the father) never became a citizen of the United States, Jacob Bohn (the son) was born of German parents in the United States. According to the Constitution and laws of the United States as interpreted by the courts, a child born to alien parents in the United States is an American citizen, although such child may also be a citizen of the country of citizen, although such child may also be a citizen of the country of his parents according to the law of that country.

"Although there is no express provision in the law of the United States giving election of citizenship in such cases, this Department has always held in such circumstances that if a child is born of foreign parents in the United States, and is taken during minority to the country of his parents, such child upon arriving of age, or within a reasonable time thereafter, must make election between the citizenship which is his by birth and the citizenship which is his by parentage. In case a person so circumstanced elects American citizenship, he must, unless in extraordinary circumstances, in order to render his election effective, manifest an intention in good faith to return with all convenient speed to the United States and assume the duties of citizenship."

return with all convenient speed to the United States and assume the duties of citizenship."

We have quoted liberally from these rulings—and many others might be cited—in view of the contention now urged by the petitioners in resisting Miss Elg's claim to citizenship. We think that they leave no doubt of the controlling principle long recognized by this Government. That principle, while administratively applied, cannot properly be regarded as a departmental creation independently of the law. It was deemed to be a necessary consequence of the constitutional provision by which persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction become citizens of the United States. To cause a loss of that citizenship in the absence of treaty or statute having that effect, there must be voluntary action and such action cannot be attributed to an infant whose removal to another country is beyond his control and who during minority is incapable of a binding choice.

Petitioners stress the American doctrine relating to expatriation. By the act of July 27, 1868,8 Congress declared that "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people." Expatriation is the voluntary renunciation or abandonment of nationality and allegiance. It has no application to the removal from this country of a native citizen during minority. In such a case the voluntary action which is of the essence of the right of expatriation is lacking. That right is fittingly recognized where a child born here, who may be, or may become, subject to a dual nationality, elects on attaining majority citizenship in the country to which he has been removed. But there is no basis for invoking the doctrine of expatriation where a native citizen who is removed to his parents' country of origin during minority returns here on his majority and elects to remain and to maintain his American citizenship. Instead of being inconsistent with the right of expatriation, the principle which permits that election conserves and applies it.

patriation, the principle which permits that election conserves that applies it.

The question then is whether this well-recognized right of election has been destroyed by treaty or statute.

Third. Petitioners invoke our treaty with Sweden of 1869.¹⁰ This treaty was one of a series of naturalization treaties with similar terms, which were negotiated with various countries between 1863 and 1872.¹¹ The relevant portions of the text of the treaty with Sweden, and of the accompanying protocol, are set forth in the margin.¹² The treaty manifestly deals with expatriation and the recognition of naturalization by the respective powers. The recital states its purpose; that is, "to regulate the citizenship of those persons who emigrate" to one country from the other. The terms of the treaty are directed to that purpose and are appropriate to the recognition of the status of those who voluntarily take up their residence for the prescribed period in the country to which they emigrate. Article I of the treaty provides:

"Citizens of the United States of America who have resided in Sweden or Norway for a continuous period of at least 5 years, and during such residence have become and are lawfully recognized as citizens of Sweden or Norway, shall be held by the Government of the United States to be Swedish or Norwegian citizens, and shall be the United States to be Swedish or Norwegian citizens, and shall be treated as such.

"Reciprocally, citizens of Sweden or Norway who have resided in the United States of America for a continuous period of at least 5 years, and during such residence have become naturalized citizens of the United States, shall be held by the Government of Sweden and Norway to be American citizens, and shall be treated as such.

"The declaration of an intention to become a citizen of one or the other country has not for either party the effect of citizenship legally acquired."

We think that this provision in its direct application clearly implies a voluntary residence and it would thus apply in the instant case to the father of respondent. There is no specific mention of minor children who have obtained citizenship by birth in the country which their parents have left. And if it be assumed that a child born in the United States would be deemed to acquire the Swedish citizenship of his parents through their return to Sweden and resumption of citizenship there, is still nothing is said in the treaty which in such a case would destroy the right of election which appropriately belongs to the child on attaining majority. If the abrogation of that right had been in contemplation, it would naturally have been the subject of a provision suitably explicit. Rights of citizenship are not to be destroyed by an ambiguity. Moreover, the provisions of article III must be read in connection with article I. Article III provides:

"If a citizen of the one party who has become a recognized." provides:

"If a citizen of the one party, who has become a recognized citizen of the other party, takes up his abode once more in his original country and applies to be restored to his former citizenship, the government of the last-named country is authorized to receive him again as a citizen on such conditions as the said government may think proper."

If the first article could be taken to cover the case of a child through the derivation of citizenship from that of his emigrating parents, article III, by the same token, would be applicable to the case of a child born here and taken to Sweden, who at majority elects to return to the United States and to assume the privileges and obligations of American citizenship. In that event, the Gov-ernment of the United States is expressly authorized to receive one so returning "as a citizen on such conditions as the said Govern-ment may think proper." And if this Government considers that a native citizen taken from the United States by his parents during minority is entitled to retain his American citizenship by electing at majority to return and reside here, there would appear to be nothing in the treaty which would gainsay the authority of the United States to recognize that privilege of election and to receive the returning native upon that basis. Thus, on the facts of the the returning native upon that basis. Thus, on the facts of the present case, the treaty does not purport to deny to the United States the right to treat respondent as a citizen of the United States, and it necessarily follows that, in the absence of such a denial, the treaty cannot be set up as a ground for refusing to accord to respondent the rights of citizenship in accordance with our Constitution and laws by virtue of her birth in the United States.

Nor do we find anything in the terms of the protocol, accompanying the treaty, which can be taken to override the right of election which respondent would otherwise possess. Article III of the protocol refers to the case of a Swede who has become a naturalized citizen of the United States and later renews his residence in Sweden "without the intent to return to America." And it provides that the intent not to return may be held to exist when the person "so naturalized" resides more than 2 years in Sweden. This person "so naturalized" resides more than 2 years in Sweden. This does not appear to be applicable to respondent, who was born in the United States, but, apart from that, the intent not to return could not properly be attributed to her during minority, and if it were so attributed, the presumption would be rebutted by the election to return to the United States at majority. Compare United States v. Howe (231 Fed. 546, 549 14).

The views we have expressed find support in the construction placed upon the naturalization treaties of 1868 to 1872 15 in the period following their ratification. The first of those treaties was made in 1868 with the North German Confederation 16 and contained provisions similar to those found in the treaty with Sweden. tained provisions similar to those found in the treaty with Sweden. But it was under this German treaty that Steinkauler's case arose in 1875, to which we have already referred, where Attorney General Pierrepont upheld the right of election, saying," "Under the treaty, and in harmony with the American doctrine, it is clear that Steinkauler, the father, abandoned his naturalization in America and became a German subject (his son being yet a minor) and that by virtue of German laws the son acquired German nationality. It is equally clear that the son by birth has American nationality, and hence he has two nationalities, one natural, the other acquired.

* * There is no law of the United States under which his father or any other person can describe him of his birthright." To father or any other person can deprive him of his birthright." To the same effect, as to the right of election, was the ruling of Secretary Evarts in 1879 in his instruction, above quoted, to our Minister to Germany with respect to the brothers Boissellers. There were provisions similar to those in the treaty with Sweden in the naturalization treaty with Denmark of 1872. But Secretary Evarts evidently, did not recard those provisions is inconsistent.

Evarts evidently did not regard those provisions as inconsistent with the claim, which he sustained, of one born here of Danish parentage who was taken abroad by his parents but insisted upon his American citizenship when he arrived at his majority.²⁰ These rulings, following closely upon the negotiation of these naturalization treaties, show beyond question that the treaties were not regarded as abrogating the right of election for which respondent

Later rulings were to the same effect. Thus, in 1890, in dealing with a native American citizen who, upon his own application, had been admitted to Danish citizenship during his minority, and who had not yet come of age, the Secretary of State, while recognizing that "when a citizen of the United States voluntarily becomes naturalized or renaturalized in a foreign country, he is to be regarded as having lost his rights as an American citizen," was careful to make the following qualifications in support of the was careful to make the following qualineations in support of the right of election at majority, saying:

"As Mr. Andersen has not yet attained his majority, the Department is not prepared to admit that proceedings taken on his behalf in Denmark during his minority would deprive him of his right, upon reaching the age of 21 years, to elect to become an American citizen by immediately returning to this country to resume his allegiance here." "

Petitioners refer to an instruction by Secretary Sherman in 1897 ²² in answer to a question as to the effect of a person's return to his native country for a visit on his rights as an American citizen which had been acquired through the naturalization of his father. While Secretary Sherman recognized "the acquisition of Institute of the secretary Sherman recognized". United States citizenship by an alien-born minor through the lawful naturalization of his father under the operation of section 2172, Revised Statutes," the Secretary added the following:

"If such a party having thus become a recognized citizen of the United States, takes up his abode once more in his original country, and applies to be restored to his former citizenship, the government of the last-named country is authorized to receive him again as a citizen, on such conditions as the said government may think proper (treaty of 1869, article III). Or he may, by residence in the country of origin, without intent to return to the United States, be held to have renounced his American citizenship (protocol, May 26, 1869). But this presumption, like all presumptions of intent, may be rebutted by proof. Until a person so circumstanced shall be held to have voluntarily abandoned his American citizenship, or shall have acquired another citizenship upon appli-cation to that end and by due process of law, this Government is entitled to claim his allegiance and constrained to protect him as entitled to claim his allegiance and constrained to protect him as a citizen so long as he shall be found bona fide entitled thereto." We find nothing in that instruction which is inconsistent with the maintenance of respondent's right of election in the instant case. So far as the instruction in relation to a naturalized minor may be deemed to be pertinent, it confirms rather than opposes respondent's right to be considered an American citizen.

That the Department of State continued to maintain the right of election is further shown by the memorandum of applicable [&]quot;While the nationality law of Sweden is not to be regarded as controlling unless the treaty makes it so—which we have found is not the case—it may be observed that it is not clear that the law of Sweden would operate so as to preclude recognition that respondent is a citizen of the United States. See the Swedish law of May 7, 1909, art. 8. That, however, is a question of foreign law which we find it unnecessary to attempt to determine.

principles which it issued in 1906, above quoted, to the effect that the Department had "always held in such circumstances that if a child is born of foreign parents in the United States, and is taken a child is born of foreign parents in the United States, and is taken during minority to the country of his parents, such child upon arriving of age, or within a reasonable time thereafter, must make election between the citizenship which is his by birth and the citizenship which is his by parentage." **

Fourth. We think that petitioners' contention under section 2 of the act of March 2, 1907,  is equally untenable. That statutory provision is as follows:

"That any American citizen shall be deemed to have expatriated."

"That any American citizen shall be deemed to have expatriated himself when he has been naturalized in any foreign state in con-formity with its laws, or when he has taken an oath of allegiance to any foreign state.

When any naturalized citizen shall have resided for 2 years in "When any naturalized citizen shall have resided for 2 years in the foreign state from which he came, or for 5 years in any other foreign state it shall be presumed that he has ceased to be an American citizen, and the place of his general abode shall be deemed his place of residence during said years: Provided, however, That such presumption may be overcome on the presentation of satisfactory evidence to a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Department of State may prescribe: And provided also, That no American citizen shall be allowed to expatriate himself when this country is

Petitioners contend that respondent's acquisition of derivative Swedish citizenship makes her a person who has been "naturalized under Swedish law," and that therefore "she has lost her American citizenship" through the operation of this statute. We are unable to accept that view. We think that the statute was aimed at a voluntary expatriation and we find no evidence in its terms that it was intended to destroy the right of a native citizen, removed from this country during minority, to elect to retain the citizenship acquired by birth and to return here for that purpose. If by virtue of derivation from the citizenship of one's parents a child in that situation can be deemed to have been naturalized under the foreign law, still we think in the absence of any provision to the contrary that such naturalization would not destroy

It should also be noted that the act of 1907 in sections 5 and 6.25 has specific reference to children born without the United States of has specific reference to children born without the United States of alien parents but says nothing as to the loss of citizenship by minor children born in the United States.

That in the latter case the child was not deemed to have lost his American citizenship by virtue of the terms of the statute but might still with reasonable promptness on attaining majority manifest his election is shown by the views expressed in the instructions issued under date of November 24, 1923, by the Department of State to the American diplomatic and consular officers. These instructions dealt with the questions arising under the Citizenship Act of March 2, 1907, and cases of dual nationality. It was stated that it was deemed desirable "to inform diplomatic and consular officers of the Department's conclusions, for their guidance in handling individual cases." Commenting on dual nationality, the instructions said:

"The term 'dual nationality' needs exact appreciation. It refers

'The term 'dual nationality' needs exact appreciation. to the fact that two states make equal claim to the allegiance of an individual at the same time. Thus, one state may claim his allegiance because of his birth within its territory, and the other because at the time of his birth in foreign territory his parents were its nationals. The laws of the United States purport to clothe persons with American citizenship by virtue of both principles."

And after referring to the fourteenth amendment and the act of February 2, 1855, Revised Statutes, 1993, the instructions continued:

"It thus becomes important to note how far these differing claims of American nationality are fairly operative with respect to persons living abroad, whether they were born abroad or were born in the United States of alien parents and taken during minority to reside in the territory of states to which the parents owed allegiance. It is logical that, while the child remains or resides in territory of the foreign state claiming him as a national, the United States should respect its claim to allegiance. The important point to observe is that the doctrine of dual allegiance ceases, in American contemplation, to be fully applicable after the child has reached adult years. Thereafter two states may in fact claim him as a national. Those claims are not, however, regarded as of equal merit, because one of the states may then justly assert that his relationship to itself as a national is, by reason of circumstances that have arisen, inconsistent with, and reasonably superior to, any claim of allegiance asserted by is, by reason of circumstances that have arisen, inconsistent with, and reasonably superior to, any claim of allegiance asserted by any other state. Ordinarily the state in which the individual retains his residence after attaining his majority has the superior claim. The statutory law of the United States affords some guidance but not all that could be desired, because it fails to announce the circumstances when the child who resides abroad within the territory of a state reasonably claiming his allegiance forfeits completely the right to perfect his inchoate right to retain American citizenship. The department must, therefore, be reluctant to declare that particular conduct on the part of a person after reaching adult years in foreign territory produces a forfeiture or something equivalent to expatriation.

"The statute does, however, make a distinction between the burforfeiture or something equivalent to expatriation.

"The statute does, however, make a distinction between the burden imposed upon the person born in the United States of foreign parents and the person born abroad of American parents. With respect to the latter, section 6 of the act of March 2, 1907, lays down the requirement that as a condition to the protection of the United States the individual must, upon reaching the age of 18, record at an American consulate an intention to remain a citizen of the United States, and must also take an oath of allegiance to the United States upon extensing his majority.

"The child born of foreign parents in the United States who spends his minority in the foreign country of his parents' nationality is not expressly required by any statute of the United States to make the same election as he approaches or attains his majority. It is, nevertheless, believed that his retention of a right to demand the protection of the United States should, despite the absence of statute, be dependent upon his convincing the Department within a reasonable period after the attaining of his majority of an election to return to the United States, there to assume the duties of citizenship. In the absence of a definite statutory requirement, it is impossible to prescribe a limited period within which such election should be made. On the other hand, it may be asserted negatively that one who has long manifested no indication of a will to make such an election should not receive the protection of the United States save under the express approval of the Department."

It thus appears that as late as 1925, when the Department issued its "compilation" including the circular instruction of November 24, 1923, it was the view of the Department of State that the act of March 2, 1907, had not taken away the right of a native citizen on attaining majority to retain his American citizenship, where he of March 2, 1907, had not taken away the right of a native citizen on attaining majority to retain his American citizenship, where he was born in the United States of foreign parents. We do not think that it would be a proper construction of the act to hold that while it leaves untouched the right of election on the part of a child born in the United States, in case his parents were foreign nationals at the time of his birth and have never lost their foreign nationality, still the statute should be treated as destroying that right of election if his parents became foreign nationals through naturalization. That would not seem to be a sensible distinction. right of election if his parents became foreign nationals through naturalization. That would not seem to be a sensible distinction. Having regard to the plain purpose of section 2 of the act of 1907, to deal with voluntary expatriation, we are of the opinion that its provisions do not affect the right of election, which would otherwise exist, by reason of a wholly involuntary and merely derivative naturalization in another country during minority. And, on the facts of the instant case, this view apparently obtained when in July 1929, on the instructions of the Secretary of State, the Department issued the passport to respondent as a citizen of the United States.

But although respondent promptly made her election and took up her residence in this country accordingly, and had continued to reside here, she was notified in April 1935 that she was an alien and was threatened with deportation.

When, precisely, there occurred a change in the departmental attitude is not clear.²⁸ It seems to have resulted in a conflict with attitude is not clear. It seems to have resulted in a conflict with the opinion of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor in the case of Ingrid Therese Tobiassen, and the Secretary of Labor because of that conflict requested the opinion of the Attorney General, which was given on June 16, 1932. It appeared that Miss Tobiassen, aged 20, was born in New York in 1911; that her father, a native of Norway, became a citizen of the United States by naturalization in 1912; that in 1919 Miss Tobiassen was taken by her parents to Norway, where the latter had since resided; that at the age of 18 she returned to the United States and took up her permanent residence in New Jersey. The question arose when she asked for a return permit to visit her parents. The Department of State refused to issue a passport on the ground that Miss Tobiassen had acquired Norwegian nationality and had ceased to be an American citizen. The Attorney General's opinion approved that action.

His opinion quoted the provisions of the treaty with Sweden and Norway of 1869 to and referred to the Norwegian nationality law of August 8, 1924, and to the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1907. The opinion noted that the claim that Miss Tobias sen had ceased to be an American citizen did "not rest upon the terms of the naturalization treaty with Norway but upon a law of that country, as a result of the renunciation by her father, a native of Norway, of his American citizenship, and the resumption of his Norwegian nationality in pursuance of the terms of that treaty." The law of Norway was deemed to be analogous to our statutes "by virtue of which foreign-born minor children of persons naturalized in the United States are declared to be citizens of this country"; and hence the conclusion that Miss Tobiassen having acquired Norwegian nationality had in consequence ceased to be an American citizen was said to be correct.

citizen was said to be correct.

The opinion does not discuss the right of election of a native citizen of the United States when he becomes of age to retain American citizenship and does not refer to the repeated rulings of the Department of State in recognition of that right, the exercise of which, as we have pointed out, should not be deemed to be inconsistent with either treaty or statute. We are reluctant to disagree with the opinion of the Attorney General, and we are fully conscious of the problems incident to dual nationality and of the departmental desire to limit them, but we are compelled to agree with the Court of Appeals in the instant case that the conclusions of that opinion are not adequately supported and are opposed to the established principles which should govern the disposition of this case.²³

Nor do we think that recent private acts of Congress ³² for the relief of native citizens who have been the subject of administrative action denying their rights of citizenship, can be regarded as the equivalent of an act of Congress providing that persons in the situation of the respondent here have lost the American citizenship which they acquired at birth and have since duly elected to retain.

No such statute has been enacted.

We conclude that respondent has not lost her citizenship in the United States and is entitled to all the rights and privileges of that citizenship.

Fifth. The cross petition of Miss Elg, upon which certiorari was granted in No. 455, is addressed to the part of the decree below which dismissed the bill of complaint as against the Secretary of State. The dismissal was upon the ground that the retary of State. The dismissal was upon the ground that the court would not undertake by mandamus to compel the issuance of a passport or control by means of a declaratory judgment the discretion of the Secretary of State. But the Secretary of State, according to the allegation of the bill of complaint, had refused to issue a passport to Miss Elg "solely on the ground that she had lost her native-born American citizenship." The court below, had lost her native-born American citizenship." The court below, properly recognizing the existence of an actual controversy with the defendants (Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U. S. 227), declared Miss Eig "to be a natural-born citizen of the United States" and we think that the decree should include the Secretary of State as well as the other defendants. The decree in that sense would in no way interfere with the exercise of the Secretary's discretion with respect to the issue of a passport but would simply preclude the denial of a passport on the sole ground that Miss Elg had lost her American citizenship.

The decree will be modified accordingly so as to strike out that portion which dismisses the bill of complaint as to the Secretary of State, and so as to include him in the declaratory provision of the decree, and as so modified the decree is affirmed.

It is so ordered. Mr. Justice Douglas took no part in the consideration and decision of this case.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5748) to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, yesterday when this bill was made the unfinished business the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] submitted an amendment, to lie on the table and be printed, and stated that he would offer it to the pending bill today. I merely wish to make a short state-ment with reference to the bill now pending before the Senate.

The bill proposes to amend the Second Liberty Bond Act by striking out the present limitation of $30,000,000,000 on the amount of bonds which may be outstanding at any one time. The present limitation upon the total amount of public-debt obligations is $45,000,000,000, and there is a limitation of $30,000,000,000 on the amount of bonds which may be outstanding at any one time. We propose in this bill, without increasing the limitation on Federal issues above the $45,000,000,000, to remove the partition that separates the short-term paper from the long-term paper, so that if the Treasury desires, in the interest of better financing, to issue long-term obligations in place of short-term obligations it may do so within the limit of $45,000,000,000.

The necessity for the bill was stated very succinctly by the Secretary of the Treasury when he appeared before the Finance Committee. I quote from his statement:

The limitation of $30,000,000,000 on outstanding bonds presents, however, a different problem. The additional amount of bonds which the Treasury can issue under this authority and within this limitation is $1,697,000,000.

Ordinarily that is quite a large sum, but in Federal parlance it is a relatively small amount when the limit is $45,000,000,000,000 and the Treasury is within $1,697,000,000 of the $30,000,000,000 limitation on bonds.

Taking into consideration our cash requirements between now and June 30, 1940-

Says the Secretary-

the monthly issuance of United States Savings bonds, and the refunding operations which the Treasury will have to conduct within the next 12 months, it seems quite clear that the balance of $1,697,000,000 will not be sufficient to give the Treasury that latitude required in its financial operations up to June 30, 1940.

In removing the limitation on the issuance of bonds, Congress will place the Treasury in a position where it can better manage the public debt by taking advantage of any favorable condition in the bond market and will relieve the Treasury of the necessity of restricting a large part of its financing operations during the next 12 months to short-term obligations.

These arguments appealed to the Finance Committee. The bill passed the House with very little opposition; and, so far as the Finance Committee is concerned, it was recommended without dissent for passage by the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator must not include me in the statement that the bill was recommended by the Finance Committee without dissent. I was opposed to the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I except the dissent of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, from the minority side of the Finance Committee I desire to say simply this about the bill:

We listened very attentively to Secretary Morgenthau, who was completely frank about the situation. I quite agree with the able Senator from Mississippi that we have no alternative but to grant this authority. It does not increase the debt limit; but I think we should fully understand precisely what the Secretary warned us is about to happen.

The debt limit will be reached at the end of the next fiscal year. In other words, while this particular measure postpones an increase in the debt limit, it merely postpones the evil day when the debt limit must increase beyond $45,000,-000,000 unless deficit spending stops. The Secretary will not even guarantee an opinion that we can stay within this debt limit during the next fiscal year, except as we stay within the Budget during the next fiscal year. So the Senate need have no illusions as to the financial situation which is presented by this measure.

At the end of the next fiscal year we shall have exhausted the debt limit. The only time to control a debt is when appropriations are made which contribute to the debt. All in the world I want to say is that the President of the United States was utterly correct on March 10, 1933, when he said:

Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger.

We are not avoiding it; but it is about time we started to commence to get ready to begin to try.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, not being on the committee, I do not understand the purpose of the bill. What is its object? What does it accomplish? Whom does it help?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to give a chronological history of this amendment, on the 14th day of March a bill known as Senate bill 1796 was introduced by me to amend two sections of the T. V. A. Act.

On the 15th day of March an identical bill was introduced in the other House by two Members of that body.

On April 15 the Senate passed the bill, which in the meantime had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry without amendment. In the House the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On May 4—remembering, now, that the bill was introduced in the House on March 15—a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee took up the bill. They finally adjourned until May 10 to have some hearings.

On May 10 the committee had some hearings, and then adjourned for a week, until May 17.

On May 17 they had a few more hearings, and then adjourned until May 19.

On May 19 the committee adjourned until May 24, at which time they heard a witness or two and adjourned.

On May 25, following the meeting of May 24, the committee adjourned again until Friday, June 2, which will be tomorrow.

The bill to which I refer was intended to, and will, I think—there is no dispute about it—in effect legalize a contract made between the T. V. A. and a private power company, the Commonwealth & Southern, whose president is Mr. Willkie. The country generally understood that they had agreed on the price of a subsidiary corporation of the Commonwealth & Southern, the Tennessee Valley Power Co., and one or two other similar corporations. The entire property was sold to the T. V. A., and an agreement for purchase was entered into.

Under the then existing law, the T. V. A. were without authority to issue bonds to purchase property. They were given authority to issue bonds to construct dams on the Tennessee River and its tributaries. The bill that the Senate passed, which is the amendment I am now offering, enlarged that authority, and provided for issuing bonds for the purchase of existing generating systems.

It is necessary, I think, to enact the bill in order to legalize the contract by which this purchase was made. The country generally understood the transaction; and almost universally, so far as I have heard, without a single exception, newspapers and other periodicals that were opposed to the T. V. A. applauded the agreement, because they universally said—and it was true—that in fixing the price on the property the T. V. A. had been very liberal. The purchase would end all further controversy between them and the greatest private power company in the T. V. A. territory.

The arrangement was universally approved, I think, by friend and foe alike of the T. V. A., because it did what the enemies of T. V. A. always said ought to be done, and what I always said ought to be done; that if it became necessary for the T. V. A. to buy a system that was competing with it the parties ought to agree on a price, if possible, and the T. V. A. ought to buy the transmission lines and the generating plants.

That is just what was done in this instance. The T. V. A. took into the contract that was made the different distributing systems in the various municipalities, including the biggest one, Nashville, and the next one, Chattanooga. They were in on the contract; and under it they were to buy the distributing systems in their respective municipalities. The T. V. A. were to buy the transmission lines and the generating plants.

The Senate passed the bill practically unanimously. I do not see any possible objection to the transaction from any standpoint from which we may look at it. The negotiations lasted for practically a year, and the purchase was finally agreed on by the owners of the property and the T. V. A.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. The only question in my mind is as to the legislative status of the bill passed by the Senate, and how it might be affected by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the pending measure.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a very proper question, and I think I can answer it satisfactorily.

Mr. REED. May I state my understanding of the matter? Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I have so much respect for the distinguished Senator from Nebraska that I am always reluctant to raise any question about anything he advocates. My understanding of the legislative status is that the bill passed by the Senate has gone into hearings in the House, to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred, and that those hearings are now under way and have not been concluded. From the standpoint of my limited legislative experience, what the Senator from Nebraska proposes is rather novel. The Senate having passed a bill which is now in the other House of Congress, under consideration by a committee which is holding hearings, it is proposed that the Senate shall attach the text of the bill to the measure now under consideration. That would seem to me to produce a rather peculiar legislative situation and might perhaps be regarded by the House of Representatives as a discourtesy to the House.

I have tried to make a statement of my understanding, and I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if my view is

Mr. NORRIS. Partially. I will try to explain the matter fully, and show the necessity of this amendment being approved if the agreement entered into by the T. V. A. is to be carried out.

The hearings which have proceeded in the Committee on Military Affairs of the other House have been delayed from day to day and week to week, after the bill was introduced on the 15th day of last March. A witness will testify for an hour and then the hearing will be adjourned for a week. Once the committee had hearings 2 days in succession. So far as I can ascertain, there has been no objection to the bill of a material nature in the hearings. The Governor of Tennessee appeared and approved the bill, the Governor of Alabama approved it by telegram or letter, as did the Governor of Georgia. A State-wide organization in Tennessee, the Taxpayers' League, I think it is called, which had some objections and wanted to have a tax amendment added, finally agreed, because of the conditions which I shall attempt to explain in a few moments, not to press the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I beg the indulgence of the Senator from Nebraska? I was not discussing the merits of the bill, and nothing that I said went to the merits.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand.

Mr. REED. I was endeavoring to determine what was the legislative situation.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to explain that.

Mr. REED. And whether or not this is not an extraordinary procedure.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall come to that very point. I thought that what I stated was proper, because, so far as I can determine, the only people who have said anything in opposition during the investigation, which has been dragging on for months and adjourning from week to week, consisted of a man in Pennsylvania, whose testimony I have not been able to get, who appeared in opposition, and a coal man in southern Alabama, as I recall, who also appeared against it. Practically everyone has been in favor of the bill. The Taxpayers' League, to which I was trying to call the Senator's attention, withdrew the amendment relative to taxation which at first they wanted attached to the bill when they understood the conditions which I shall explain in a few moments, and they approved the bill, and asked for its passage. I do not think anyone concerned is opposed to the passage of the bill except the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives and some of his colleagues.

Mr. President, I shall now state why expedition is necessary. The city of Chattanooga, the third city in size in Tennessee, was a party to the negotiations which proceeded for many months. Prior to the commencement of those negotiations the people of Chattanooga took a vote upon taking

T. V. A. power, and they decided by an overwhelming majority to take T. V. A. power, and they set up a board to negotiate.

The distributing system was owned by the Tennessee Power Co., controlled by the Commonwealth & Southern. So Chattanooga was one of the cities in this contract. It negotiated with the power company to buy the distributing system, but could not make any headway. Finally, after about 3 years, or longer, after the vote had been taken, the city gave up negotiating, and started to build a distributing system, which the election provided could be done.

Contracts were made, and the city has in fact constructed a small part of the distributing system. But it wanted to avoid putting in a second distributing system when the power company already had one there. So the negotiations proceeded, and Chattanooga agreed, as did the city of Nashville, with Mr. Willkie and with the T. V. A., to make this deal, and agreed to take over the distributing system owned by the power company, and not build a competing one. They had gone so far that they could not wait indefinitely. They had had their election. Two or three years had elapsed before they ceased negotiations to buy. Finally they commenced building a system, and a portion of it has been constructed.

The deal made between the municipality on the one side and T. V. A. and the private power company provided for the ending of all the negotiations, the sale to take place on the 20th day of June, this month. It was several months ago when the agreement was made.

Mr. Willkie had several things to do in order to prepare the municipalities where he owned all the distributing systems and all the generating systems, and he has done his part, the T. V. A. have done their part, and the municipalities have done their part. It all awaits action by Congress extending the authority of the T. V. A. to purchase existing generating plants, as well as to build plants. Unless this amendment shall become the law several days before the 20th of June, the deal must fall and Chattanooga will go on with the construction of a competing distribution system.

Mr. Willkie himself appeared before the committee and pleaded with them to report the bill. There is no dissension on the part of the private power companies, because unless this matter is completed by the 20th of June, the negotiation by which this great sale was determined, and all the negotiations agreed to, will have to fall. That is the reason why it is important to attach this amendment to the pending bill.

At the rate the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is proceeding, it will not be physically possible to report the bill to the full committee, have the full committee report it to the House, and the House pass it, in time to make good the contract, to which everyone has agreed.

If this amendment shall be attached to the pending bill, the amendment being a measure which the Senate once passed after full debate and discussion, this is what I think will happen: When the bill is messaged over to the House it will be in order there, under their rules, to move to concur in the amendment. I hope that kind of a motion will be made. A roll call will be had. If the House approves the amendment, the matter will be ended. If the House rejects the amendment, then the fight to put it through expeditiously, at least so far as I am concerned, will be ended. I desire to see a vote in the House of Representatives, and I have been importuned by almost numberless Members of the House of Representatives to make this motion, some of them members of the Committee on Military Affairs, where the bill is slumbering sweetly, and will slumber until after the 20th of June.

Mr. REED. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to say to the Senator that I do not know Mr. Willkie; I have never had any communication with him, directly or indirectly, and nothing I have said or will say goes to the merits of the bill which passed this body, but it seems to me to be an extraordinary procedure to attach a bill it has already passed as an amendment to another bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not extraordinary; similar action is often taken in both Houses.

I have explained what is happening to the bill in committee. It is going to be held back until the 20th of June has come and gone. Are we to kill the deal which people all over the country thought was one of the grandest things that had ever happened the T. V. A. and its greatest competitor having met after months and months of argument and consultation among their experts, and agreed upon a price?

Mr. REED. Regardless of that, will not the Senator agree that, after all, the procedure now proposed is a direct criticism of the way the House of Representatives is handling this particular piece of legislation?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not criticism of the House of Representatives. It is an attempt to enable the rank and file of the House of Representatives to have a vote, to vote the matter up or down. It is not a thing which has to be done; it is not vital, probably, to the power companies or to the T. V. A.; but it will end this long fight; it will do just what the enemies of T. V. A. have always said we ought to do—take over this property.

The minority of the committee appointed to investigate T. V. A. is opposed to the T. V. A. and always has been. Let me read what even they say in their report about this kind of a purchase.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are plenty of precedents for the proposed action, are there not?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; many precedents. It is no insult to anyone, and no one will take it as an insult. It has often been done to the Senate by the House of Representatives, and has been done by the Senate in the case of many measures. If I had known anyone would object on that ground, I would have had the precedents run down. Numerous precedents could be presented.

I shall read the language of the minority report. I read it once before in the Senate when the T. V. A. amendment was under consideration, and I endorse fully and completely the part of the minority report which I shall read. It has always been my belief—and I think the T. V. A. has leaned backward in this respect—that if it became necessary and it were decided that the T. V. A. should go into a territory already occupied by a public utility, the utility property proposed to be taken over should be acquired by agreement and purchase, if possible.

I presume there are no more bitter enemies of T. V. A. in existence than those who prepared the minority report of the committee. They have always condemned the T. V. A. I read the language of the minority report:

We are of the opinion that if and when the Federal Government considers it advisable to establish publicly owned power facilities in localities already served by private companies the Federal Government, in order to avoid duplication of such service, should purchase the properties involved at a fair price determined either by negotiation, arbitration, or condemnation.

The price was agreed on by negotiation. Both sides agreed on it. I think the terms of purchase agreed upon were very liberal. That is the general opinion of the newspapers of the country.

Determined either by negotiation or arbitration or condemnation. In the latter case—

That is, in the case of condemnation-provision being made to preclude unnecessary delay incident to legal action.

In another place the language of the minority report is as follows:

Primarily, the principal function of the T. V. A. is that of river control, meaning by this navigation and flood control, including, of course, the construction and operation of the dams on the Tennessee River and its tributaries. This is not only the primary purpose under the Constitution and the law, but it should be the primary purpose in fact.

That is just what the measure provides.

Construction already completed, under way, and about to be taken has committed the Government to a system of multipurpose dams. We believe that the Tennessee Valley is well fitted for carrying out such a project of the multipurpose dams as an experiment to be thoroughly tested before being introduced elsewhere.

In the construction of such dams a large amount of power may well be generated. It should not be wasted. It should be sold and the proceeds be used to pay operating expenses, interest, taxes, and other costs, direct and indirect, and in the end there should be a return to the Government of all direct power investment and that part of the investment in dams and reservoirs charged to power. In the operation of the power project, however, it is essential that the production of power be subordinated to the function of navigation and flood control if they are to be effective. In the operation of dams, primarily for navigation and flood control, valuable power may be generated, but we believe that the organization should be so set up that navigation and flood control will have the right-of-way.

That again is what the measure provides. It does not do anything else.

Some objection was made that the amount of bonds authorized, $100,000,000, is more than the T. V. A. will have to issue in connection with this particular negotiated purchase, and therefore we might as well cut down the amount of bonds. It is true that it will take only $43,000,000 to carry out the purchase, but the same parties, the Commonwealth & Southern, headed by Mr. Willkie, will commence negotiations at once to sell some similar properties in northern Alabama, with respect to which they are going to negotiate and try to agree upon a price, and also some property in northern Mississippi. So the amount of bonds was fixed at $100,000,000, which is the exact amount existing law provides for in two different sections; $50,000,000 in section 15 and $50,000,000 in section 15 (a). But the bonds to be issued under section 15 (a) would have the same privilege as Panama Canal bonds, and the Secretary of the Treasury did not want that privilege to exist with respect to the new bonds. He did not want any more bonds of the Government issued which contained that privilege. That is the reason the language which made that particular provision was stricken out. Provision for the $100,000,000 of bonds is contained in sections 15 and 15 (a) of the T. V. A. Act.

Under the second section to which I referred the bonds may be issued for the purpose of buying transmission lines. That could be done now without amending the act. Bonds could be issued for that purpose. The T. V. A. could build dams with the proceeds of bonds which were issued, but there is no express authority, at least, and no other authority unless one would imply authority which does not exist—there is no express authority for the T. V. A. to buy generating plants already existing. So we took those two sections and put them into one section, section 15, as it is now in the pending amendment. So there is no increase in the amount of bonds provided for. However, provision is made for an extension of time in which they may be issued. I think the measure provides that they may be issued up to July 1, 1941.

I wish to refer to another matter. These bonds will not be redeemed by congressional appropriations. They will be redeemed by the sale of power. One of the dams which ought to be acquired and owned by the T. V. A. is Hales bar dam on the Tennessee River proper. The river should be enlarged in order to make it possible to navigate the river between Hales bar and Chattanooga. That is included in the measure. We have made appropriations for the construction of these dams. In the case of the Hales bar dam we would get a big dam and we could improve navigation. Flood control would also be involved. No appropriation in that connection is asked for. The purchase will be made by money received from the sale of these bonds. These bonds will be redeemed by the sale of electric power. The amount of appropriations which will be necessary to carry out the terms of the T. V. A. Act will be decreased by the amount of bonds that are issued.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. It is some time since I read the bill, but it is my understanding that the Government of the United States guarantees the bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. The Government guarantees the bonds. It does that under existing law. We do not have to change the law in that respect. The language of the amendment is word for word the language of the existing law. The property involved is Government property. Why should not the Government guarantee the bonds that are issued? T. V. A. belongs to the Federal Government and the Federal Government guarantees its bonds. If we do not amend the law, the law anyway would provide for Government guaranty of the bonds. The language of the amendment does not make a syllable of change in that respect.

I shall be glad, if I can, to answer any other questions any Senators wish to ask. I have gone over the matter as briefly as I can. If there is any matter with respect to which any Senator would like to have information and I am able to give it, I should like to do so. There is nothing to be concealed. There is nothing to be covered up. I do not believe anyone can read the minority report on the bill which was passed by the Senate without being convinced that the measure is just. Its purposes will not be carried out unless the amendment is agreed to and goes to the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives must pass on it. All I ask is that the House be given the privilege of passing on it. If they vote it down, then the contract is ended. It cannot be carried out then.

Mr. President, there is a personal reason why I introduced the bill which I now propose as an amendment to the pending measure and why I favor its enactment into law. I have always been charged, as Senators know, with being interested in this great project simply because of power development. I have denied that charge so often that I am tired of denying it. The charge that all I care for is power probably will be reasserted tomorrow by some enemy of T. V. A. Power, Mr. President, is a secondary or a third consideration with me. The production of power in connection with T. V. A. development is not as important as navigation, or as constitutional as navigation either. Power is not nearly as valuable as flood control. But when these high dams for flood control and navigation are built, as the minority report of the committee said, necessarily a large amount of power is produced. That power should not be wasted. The Congress passed the T. V. A. Act 6 years ago to take care of the power, and this amendment only carries out the intent and the spirit of that act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator a question. As I understand, negotiations were entered into between the T. V. A. and the private interests in the belief that they had the authority to consummate the contract. After they had made the agreement it turned out that probably the language of the original T. V. A. Act did not authorize the purchase of the facilities, while it did authorize construction; and in order that the contract which has been entered into, which seems to me to be a fair contract both to the Government and private interests, could be consummated, it became necessary to amend the law. I believe the terms of the contract expire on the 20th of June, 3 weeks from now.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. What will happen if the contract is not authorized?

Mr. NORRIS. Before I answer that question let me say that I think the Senator is slightly in error about the parties believing that they had the authority. There was doubt about it. I concede that some lawyers claim that the authority to buy is properly implied under existing law. I doubted it very much, and there was doubt on the question on the part of the general attorney of the T. V. A., who participated in the negotiations and helped draw up the original contract. To save the question of doubt, he put in the contract a proviso—there were several other provisos, some applying to private companies and some applying to the Government—to the effect that the contract is made on the specific understanding that Congress will pass any amendment that may be necessary to give legality to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Whether or not I was correct in assuming that the parties thought they had the authority, or whether or not there was dispute about it, is not material.

Mr. NORRIS. No; that is not material.

Mr. BARKLEY. The real point is, What will happen to the agreement if it is not sanctioned by an act of Congress within the next 3 weeks?

Mr. NORRIS. It will have to be sanctioned in less than 3 weeks; otherwise the contract will be dead. I do not mean that such a measure should not subsequently be passed; but this particular contract will be dead. As Mr. Willkie said, unless the contract is approved great loss will result, because we are faced with the fact that in Chattanooga plans are ready for the construction of a duplicate system, and we have not been able to reach an agreement by which that construction can be prevented.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator about that point. Of course, if the contract should lapse and die on the 20th of June, or at any other time, and the whole thing should become null and void, the T. V. A. still would have authority to go ahead and construct all these facilities?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If that were done, of course, two systems would be duplicating each other in the same territory.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Which would very materially affect the value of the securities of the private institution.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to that point. I should have forgotten it.

The point the Senator makes is vital. We do not want to do an injustice to a private investor. If the contract falls, the T. V. A. may go ahead under existing law and build transmission lines. Indeed, under existing law, it may issue bonds to buy the same transmission lines. If it does so—and it will have to do so to carry out the act—a duplication of privately owned lines would be necessary to supply Chattanooga, for instance, or any other city that may want power. We want to avoid that result. The private owners want to avoid it. The members of the minority on the committee of investigation called attention to the point that we ought not to duplicate unless we make a fair offer to purchase existing facilities.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the existing contract the amount of the purchase price will pay every bondholder in full, will pay every preferred-stock holder in full, and, as I remember the testimony of Mr. Willkie, will pay about 30 percent or more to the common-stock holders.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The contract is entirely satisfactory to the common-stock holders.

Mr. NORRIS. It is money in their pockets.

Mr. McKELLAR. And, of course, it is tremendously satisfactory to the bondholders and the preferred-stock holders, because there is no telling what they would receive if rival systems were built.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before this contract was made the bonds and the preferred stock of the private company were selling on the market away below par. I have not the figures before me. Immediately after the contract was made they went right up to par, because in the sale the bondholders and preferred-stock holders would receive par for their securities. So the contract means everything to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the sale, the preferred-stock holders will receive dollar for dollar.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The preferred stock had gone down to less than 40 cents on the dollar.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish to say again that I had no thought of entering into a discussion of the merits of T. V. A. I was only addressing my remarks and comments to the legislative situation as between the two Houses of Congress. I am not acquainted with any of the parties. I have no connection with any of them and have no interest in any of them. The procedure seemed to me rather unusual and perhaps extraordinary, legislatively speaking.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think it is. Of course, the Senator has a right to take that view of the matter if he wishes; but I tell the Senator that unless this measure is passed the contract will fall. There is no physical possibility of carrying it out.

So far as I know, everybody is in favor of this measure except a few Members of the House who have key positions and who are holding up the legislation and have held it up ever since the 15th of March. The time when the parties must meet and exchange their signatures to the contract and pay the money is fast approaching. Several things must be done before the 20th of June. Let me give the picture.

Mr. REED. May I make one more remark, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. If the Senate should attach the proposed amendment to the pending bill, would that action change in any way the legal status of any of the questions involved?

As I understand, the Senator from Nebraska is not satisfied with the procedure in the House of Representatives, and he desires to attach to the pending bill as an amendment the bill which the Senate has already passed, so as to persuade, force, induce-or whatever one wishes to call it-the House of Representatives to do something which up to this time under its procedure it has not done. Is not that the only point with which we are concerned?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator talks about forcing the House. The purpose is to give the Members of the House an opportunity to vote on the question, which opportunity they are denied under the House procedure. In other words, if we want to kill the contract which has been made, we should fail to pass the amendment. Of course, we could pass it afterward, and there might be a new contract. However, the contract which is pending is vital, because, as Mr. Willkie says, unless the contract goes through, Chattanooga, which consumes about a third of the electricity produced by the Tennessee Power Co., would be lost as a customer. We should then have a competing system in Chattanooga, which Mr. Willkie says would mean ruin to both sides. He said that in so many words.

I do not want to do any discourtesy to the House. The Senate has often done what is proposed. The House has often done it. I repeat, it is not a discourtesy. The purpose is to give the Members of the House an opportunity to vote; and, so far as I am concerned, their vote will settle the question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the pending amendment confined to an authorization for the one contract, or does it go beyond that?

Mr. NORRIS. It goes beyond that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the one contract the extent of the emergency?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would the Senator object to confining his amendment to the emergency?

Mr. NORRIS. I should not want to do that, because we should have to do the same thing over again.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment does not go beyond the present law. It does not provide for any additional bonds.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. Several years ago I tried to have enacted an amendment similar to the one before us. It went out in conference. We had to yield on it. But if this amendment goes through, with the amount of bonds left as it is now in the law at $100,000,000, the existing tentative contract will be carried out and it will be possible to make a similar contract.

I will say frankly that an attempt will be made to make a similar contract. Negotiations will commence at once between the T. V. A. and Mr. Willkie and several municipal corporations in Alabama and northern Mississippi in order to issue bonds in their cases to carry out the same kind of a deal which has been carried on in this instance if a price can be agreed upon. The danger is that if ever we get into any kind of a squabble which results in delay, the pending contract must be junked. In that event there would be no hope for it.

I should be afraid of any proposed modification of the amendment in the manner suggested. Besides, I am asking the Senate to do nothing but what it has already done. It has already passed the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that. The only point I was submitting to the Senator was that, it seems to me. that the emergency of the one contract might justify extraordinary procedure; but I am wondering if beyond that one contract we should not be in a better position if we permitted the House of Representatives to have a free opportunity or a freer opportunity to consider the general policy subsequently involved, insamuch as it does not seem to be essential to the point that the Senator himself is stressing to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I concede the Senator's point. If we should limit it, however, an amendment would be required which would make it different from the bill which has been passed. If we should change the pending amendment, the bill probably would have to come back to the Senate and be passed over again. The Senate has once passed it in this identical form, and if we change it we are going to meet delay. We could not help it, because, even if the House agreed to it, the measure would have to come back to the Senate for agreement on the part of the Senate.

The idea is to permit—and it ought to be permitted, I think; I have no doubt about that-negotiations of the same kind between the T. V. A. and the private power companies as to properties in northern Alabama, and other similar properties in northern Mississippi. They are in exactly the same condition. All that it is necessary to do is to agree on a price. That is what the parties concerned will try to do, as they have done in the particular instance. If we limit the amendment to one transaction, then we will have to have it all before the Congress again in order to provide necessary authority.

So it would be dangerous to amend the amendment in any respect. Nobody wants an amendment; nobody who is interested, so far as I know, wants any change. Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and all others interested, including the bondholders, want no change. I have letters from bondholders and owners of preferred stock saying, "For God's sake, let it go through. If it does not go through, I realize that my stock and my bonds, for which I will get par, will have to be sold on the market, and," as the Senator from Tennessee just said, "I will get less than 40 cents on the dollar."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.
Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that it seems to me that there is universal support for the proposition-

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. BORAH. Save and except for the suggestion which the able Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] raised, that is as to the propriety of the procedure under the circumstances. Similar procedure has been adopted on numerous occasions, and I do not think there is any impropriety whatever in the procedure. That being true, it seems to me that upon the main principle involved everyone agrees that the amendment should be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Can the Senator inform me as to the total amount of bonds already issued by the Tennessee Valley

Mr. NORRIS. No; I cannot state the figure, but the amount is not very great. I know there have been some bonds issued for the purchase of some other properties, but not to any considerable extent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think I can answer the question. Three million dollars worth of bonds have been

Mr. BYRD. What is the total capital stock that has been issued and purchased by the Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no stock.

Mr. BYRD. I think the Senator is misinformed. Does he mean that the Tennessee Valley Authority has no capital stock as a corporation?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. No stock has been issued. Only $3,000,000 of bonds of an authorized total of a hundred million have been issued.

Mr. BYRD. I think the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken about that and I will take the liberty tomorrow to insert in the RECORD some figures.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Tennessee is right about

Mr. BYRD. Does the Senator mean that only $3,000,000 of bonds and stocks have been issued by the Tennessee Valley Authority?

Mr. NORRIS. No stocks have been issued.

Mr. McKELLAR. The T. V. A. has issued no stock and only $3,000,000 of bonds. What the Tennessee Valley Authority has spent has been appropriated from the Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there to a question for information?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I have not the floor, but I will be glad to answer any questions I can.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will take the floor as no other Senator seems to want it, which is a precedent in the Senate. I will say.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be glad to have the Senator ask any question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I merely wish to ask a question, as the Senator has brought up the point. In the purchase of those outstanding utilities how did the T. V. A. pay for them unless it issued stock or bonds or assumed their indebtedness? Did it pay for them out of the Treasury?

Mr. McKELLAR. They have only recently contracted to buy them; they have not as yet bought them. The use of these bonds or a certain number of these bonds will give them the money with which to buy them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, if they have acquired these properties the properties would be security for the bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. Mr. CONNALLY. And the bonds will carry, of course, the Government guaranty, as I understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. And that would make them good regardless of their security.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the general taxpayers of the country, of course, are entitled to have the properties subjected first to the payment of these obligations rather than to take the money out of the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. Naturally. I will say to the Senator that the bonds that are now authorized cannot be used for the purchase of generating plants, and this merely gives them the right to broaden the use of the present authorized bonds.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, can the Senator from Tennessee inform me as to the total appropriations for the Tennessee Valley Authority up to date?

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot say accurately, but it is about $200,000,000.

Mr. KING. It is more than that.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is about $200,000,000. Incidentally I may say to the Senator that the income from the four dams now in operation is more than $5,000,000-about five and a half million dollars-and is constantly increasing. It will be a paying proposition.

Mr. BYRD. Do I understand that these bonds are tax exempt; that they are not subject to taxation of any kind?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator what I said when perhaps he was not in the Chamber, that there is not any change whatever in the nature of the bonds as authorized by existing law and those provided for by the amendment. The amendment is an exact copy of the law.

Mr. BYRD. I was just wondering whether the interest rate should be fixed at a maximum of 31/2 percent when the Government is able to borrow money for far less than that on tax-exempt securities.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know what the rate will be, but in my judgment the rate will probably be less than 31/2 percent. That will be subject to negotiation with the Secretary of the Treasury, because I do not suppose the Secretary of the Treasury wants to make a profit out of the transaction.

Mr. BYRD. In view of the fact that the bonds are tax exempt, would not that reduce the interest rate?

Mr. McKELLAR. It would not have any effect because the bonds are going to be sold at the lowest rate possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I claim the floor. I ask as to any of these bonds is it provided that they shall be subject to income taxes, to Federal taxation? Are they tax-exempt bonds?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are. Mr. CONNALLY. Both in the bill and in the T. V. A.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The pending amendment does not change the law at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that, but I was going to suggest that a good many Senators are always denouncing tax-exempt bonds and advocating the taxation of them both by the Federal Government and by the State governments.

Mr. NORRIS. If these bonds were subject to taxation, it would be a case of the Government taxing itself.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Because the Government in reality owns the properties.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly; I am not differentiating between the T. V. A. bonds and ordinary bonds provided for in the amendment; but if Senators really want to tax bonds now tax exempt, this is their opportunity to do so by providing that these bonds shall be subject to State taxation as well as Federal taxation. I do not think anyone wants to do that, but I wanted to call attention to the fact that if the Federal Government is to be sincere with the States, it ought not to issue its own bonds and provide that they shall be tax free and then next month propose to tax all State, county, and municipal bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. If that theory should be adopted, the Government would submit its courthouses, post offices, and all other property to State taxation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think I am in agreement with the Senator from Nebraska. I was really merely calling the matter to the attention of other Senators who are concerned about tax-exempt bonds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, like the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Reed], because of my high regard for the Senator from Nebraska, it is with reluctance that I take the floor to oppose the position which he has taken.

I have been opposed to the T. V. A. from the beginning. I think that it was an invasion of the rights of the States and sought to project the Federal Government into fields of activity which belong exclusively to private endeavor. From the debate this morning it is evident that, by coercion or cajolery or by threats or fear of destruction, private enterprise, which evidently seem to have been prosperous, have been compelled to enter into contracts with the Federal Government.

When this amendment in the form of a bill was under consideration some time ago I expected to address the Senate in opposition to it, and I prepared some memoranda, which I have amplified since the amendment was offered yesterday.

Mr. President, in my opinion, we are going far afield in the activities upon which the Federal Government is embarking. I know that any objection which may be made now will be futile; I know that this amendment will be adopted; but I am unwilling that the Record should fail to show that some Senators gave approval of the measure.

In the first place, I think it is highly improper for the Senate to attempt to regulate the procedure of the House of Representatives. I assume that the Senate would resent the efforts of the House to determine the procedure of the Senate. The House has committees organized according to its rules and in accord with the desires of that great legislative body. The Senate has committees organized under rules which the Senate after due consideration has adopted and promulgated. Under the rules of the Senate, when bills are introduced they are referred to committees which have to do with the subject-matter contained in the respective The same condition exists in the House. We have no right to say to the House, "You shall not further consider a bill, the T. V. A. bill, which we have messaged to you, and which is before one of your committees. We now propose to take it away from that committee and direct its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House." which committee, I assume, will have charge of this bill if it shall pass this body.

I think such a course would be an affront to the House. I do not approve of the policy of attaching riders to legislation, whether important or unimportant, in order to effect some short cut to a legislative goal, and coerce the House or the Senate to adopt policies which perhaps may not be favored.

I recall that at the last session of Congress the Senate committed what I conceive a grave and improper indiscretion. We had under consideration a revenue bill dealing with the District of Columbia. Some persons were so anxious to secure the enactment of what was called the fair-trade practice act, which belonged to another committee, that they attached it as a rider to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. The President of the United States, be it said to his credit, condemned that practice, and regretted that because of the lateness in the session, and the imperative necessity of having the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia become law and so felt constrained to sign the bill though he opposed the course pursued. We are now pursuing the same improper, not to say illegal, course that we pursued upon the occasion to which I have just referred.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to the policy of the Federal Government going into socialistic activities, into fields which belong to private endeavor, reversing the policy under which our Government has grown from a few small States until we now have a great federation of States, each supposed to be independent within the sphere of its own power and authority under the Constitution and under its own State constitution. But we are on the toboggan slide. We are moving into socialism and departing from the principles upon which this Republic was founded. We shall soon be controlling health, wages, hours, and virtually all the activities that belong to private endeavor, to individuals, and to sovereign States. Individualism is an anachronism, local self-government is being destroyed, and the powerful hand of the Federal Government is resting heavily upon individuals as well as upon Commonwealths.

Mr. President, I fear that we are committed to policies paternalistic and socialistic, wholly at variance with demoeratic principles and the concepts of the founders of the Republic of the limitations upon the General Government. I think we should place this bill in the category of undemocratic measures. It is directed toward state socialism and advocated, I regret to say, and supported by Democrats and by a considerable number of Republicans. Some persons perceive or expect to perceive a happy union of socialism with the Democratic and Republican Parties, and they assert that both parties bestow their benediction upon policies which are at variance with democratic institutions and our form of government.

I am opposed to the pending amendment and its entire theory. I know that any observation which I make will be futile. The forces for its passage are marshaled, and its passage is a fait accompli. The die has been cast, and the bill with this amendment attached to it will pass, and we will announce to the world that the Federal Government is a powerful national Government and is leading the people into a socialistic system.

When the T. V. A. bill was under consideration in the Senate I believed it would engulf us in an enormous expenditure, ultimately exceeding a billion dollars. It is true that it is claimed by its supporters that the appropriations to date are approximately $300,000,000, and the commitments do not exceed $570,000,000, but that is not the end. The goal will not be reached until some time in the future under this policy, when the expenditures for the socialistic schemes now contemplated will approximate or exceed a billion dollars.

Recent events abroad have caused the leaders of our Government to defend vigorously—at least, we have rendered lip service to—democratic principles, and to praise our Constitution, to denounce dictatorships, and all "isms"—fascism, nazism, communism, socialism, and totalitarianism. I am not sure that these denunciations have all been sincere or that there have not been reservations in the minds of some who have animadverted upon the growth of these "isms," so destructive of democracy and individual liberty.

We here in America, I hope, are convinced that that government is best which governs least. I am speaking of the National Government. We have learned from the teachings of history that the concentration of too much power in one person or one organization is dangerous, whether that person be the President of the United States or that organization be the Democratic Party or the Republican Party; that power begets power and, when entrenched, is used as an instrument of oppression. The shocking occurrences abroad reveal the truth of these generalizations. They require no elaboration to establish their validity and veracity.

The framers of our Constitution, recognizing the dangers of centralized power, specifically provided for a government of delegated, limited, and enumerated powers. By virtue of that great document, democracy has been maintained in the United States. But we are forgetting the 10 amendments. We are forgetting that we have a federated republic. We are building a powerful national government which is developing principles and policies hostile to democracy. The States are being devitalized, and many of the representatives of sovereign States come with cap in hand begging from the Federal Government bounties and gratuities and the extension of the authority of the National Government into the States and their political subdivisions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Schwellenbach in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The condition would not be so bad, perhaps, if the States alone were coming cap in hand to the President of the United States; but practically every embarrassed nation in the world is now doing the same thing, and we are advising and encouraging the different nations to come here to borrow vast sums of money, no part of which we are likely ever to collect, any more than we collected that which we loaned during and after the World War.

Mr. KING. I am not in disagreement with my distinguished friend. I would approve of a policy that would prevent the Treasury of the United States from being invaded by governments from overseas. We have enough burdens now. If we can maintain the credit of our Government unimpaired against the assaults from within we shall be fortunate; and we shall certainly increase the danger of impairing the credit of the country if, as indicated by my friend, we invite other nations by gestures, by words, or by conduct to come to our country asking loans and credits, particularly when they are without security.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It is not only a question of preserving the integrity of the Treasury, but all of this money must finally be collected from the pockets of the taxpayers. The ten or eleven billion dollars which is now waiting to be paid, and which I take it from the action of the various governments never will be paid, came from the taxpayers. We went out into the country and collected it by selling bonds, and so forth, and the taxpayers must pay it. If the foreign nations do not pay it, our taxpayers must pay it, and that is what is happening now. Our taxpayers are paying that which really should rest upon the shoulders of those who borrowed the money.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the able Senator has referred to a situation which I regard as a menace to our financial integrity. I wish my friend would submit his views to the Finance Committee, which will meet in a few days to increase the burden of taxation. Of course, even if we should increase the taxes this year to six or seven billion dollars. though a few years ago the total was less than a billion dollars, that amount would not meet the appropriations which this session of Congress will make. Before we adjourn, more than $10,000,000,000 will have been appropriated, and obligations will have been created which we shall be compelled to pay in the future. They will total at least three or four billion dollars. If we pursue this "rake's progress" planthis primrose path-of course it means that ultimately the Government will then resort to inflation and perhaps repudiate obligations.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator assume that the Committee on Finance will take up the question of the foreign debts when we are considering the matter of taxes at this time? Or does the Senator anticipate any action will be taken calling to the attention of these foreign debtors that these debts have been overlooked by them?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, of course I cannot speak for the committee, but speaking for myself only, I would feel that perhaps the obligation did not rest upon the Committee on Finance to deal with foreign debts except insofar as the consideration of that question might be involved in the consideration of a revenue bill. It seems to me that the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Idaho is a conspicuous member, should take up that question.

Mr. BORAH. It does seem to me that some committee should have something to say about the fact that ten or twelve billion dollars, which belongs to the taxpayers of this country, is being permitted to slip cut of hand and to go unnoticed, to be forgotten, without any effort whatever to collect it from those who owe it. Perhaps this is not the exact time to suggest the question of foreign debts, but in a week or two it might be appropriate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is very much to be said in support of the view taken by the Senator. We have so many domestic problems now with which we are ineffectively grappling that I am rather inclined to believe we will preter-mit a discussion of the problem which the Senator has just suggested. But certainly the day must come when there will be an adjustment of the obligations due the United States from foreign countries, as there must be an adjustment of obligations of individuals and corporations among themselves.

I might say, in passing, prompted by the remark of the Senator, that the Government of the United States now owes more than $40,000,000,000, it has outstanding commitments of at least five or six billion more, to say nothing of the increased obligations which will be incurred before we adjourn. The cities and counties and States have obligations amounting to some $23,000,000,000; corporations have obligations amounting to $55,000,000,000; individuals have obligations amounting to more than $60,000,000,000. Our debts added together are greater in amount than the value of the property in the United States. There seems to be no movement whatever upon the part of the Government or upon the part of the people to pursue a policy of thrift and economy, and a determined effort to bring expenditures within income. Cities, counties, States, individuals, and the Government itself are spending, using a common expression, like drunken sailors, and no plan has been devised to reduce expenses, and incorporate policies of retrenchment and reform. On the contrary, we are told we are contracting debts only among ourselves; we are owing only ourselves, and therefore need have but little concern. The view is announced that it is not unsafe or unwise to borrow and spend; that debts are not an evil-particularly if the debts are

Mr. President, I fear that in recent years there has been a trend toward centralization of the Government of the United States toward subverting, if not destroying, the inherent rights of the people and of the States, in the interest of bureaucracy entrenched in a centralized and powerful government.

The Federal Government has been reaching and grasping for power and more power. We have passed acts ostensibly in pursuance of a delegated power, but actually to achieve regulatory authority in fields in which the Federal Government has no power.

Under the taxing power the Federal Government sought to justify a regulation of agriculture, a subject matter over which the Federal Government had and has no control. Only the vigilance of an independent judiciary saved the people and the States from this obnoxious form of control. (United States v. Butler, 297 U. S. 1 (1936), and Richert Rice Mills v. Fontenot, 297 U. S. 10 (1939).)

Under the commerce power the Federal Government sought control over all industry by establishing codes of fair competition. Here again the independent judiciary, so wisely provided by the framers of the Constitution, saved the people from this obnoxious assumption of power by the Federal Government (Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U. S. 495 (1935)).

Other instances, such as the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935, held unconstitutional in Carter v. Carter Coal Co. (298 U. S. 238 (1936)), may be furnished, but it is unnecessary to dwell at length on the many similar recent enactments, most of which have not been tested in the courts because of jurisdictional difficulties.

Suffice it to say that beginning in 1933 there were many such enactments, representing the views of the then majority that the Federal Government should have more power, that it should invade by one subterfuge or another powers reserved by the Constitution to the people and to the States. Some of these acts are indefensible. They are inconsistent with American ideals. They are a challenge to the democracy which we cherish in America.

One of the most extreme examples of the type of legislation of which I have been speaking is the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. The T. V. A. cannot be reconciled with the American form of government. Socialistic enterprises subsidized by the Federal Government are not consistent with our republican form of government.

Millions of the taxpayers' dollars have been expended in the promotion of this socialistic experiment and Congress would do well to reconsider this whole legislation with a view to rectifying the mistake it made in setting up a Governmentsubsidized bureaucracy as a competitor with investor-owned

Under the guise of navigation and flood control as its constitutional justification, the T. V. A. has invaded fields in which a democratic Federal Government has no legal authority; it has curtailed free enterprise and thrust the Federal Government into an arena which belongs to private endeavor. Ostensibly enacted for flood control and in aid of navigation, but actually designed for the production of electric power, who can deny that this socialistic enterprise subverts the theory of constitutional government?

It was contended, when the T. V. A. was created, that the Federal Government had a great national investment in Wilson Dam and the nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals which could be put to the service of the people. So, to profitably use an investment subsequently appraised by T. V. A. at a valuation of no more than twenty or thirty million dollars, the Federal Government had to spend $500,000,000 or more to go into private business. Little or no value is now attached to these nitrate plants we have spent so much to

It was also contended that the farmer would profit from utilization of Muscle Shoals for fertilizer manufacturing. The amount of fertilizer the farmer has got out of this socialistic experiment would not begin to fertilize the many acres of land taken off the Federal tax rolls to be inundated in this great experiment.

It was further contended that the Government, through generation and sale of hydroelectric power, could create a 'yardstick" for the measurement of electric power rates of the privately owned public utilities, so that it might be determined if utility rates were fair. But why was Government competition necessary to determine a fair rate charge? It is my understanding that the Federal Power Commission since 1920 had accumulated vast stores of information on the cost of hydroelectric power to privately owned companies, which were licensed under the Federal Water Power Act. The entry of the Federal Government into this business could add but little to the already then existing store of Enough has been written and said about the break-down of the so-called "yardstick" means of measurement that I need not dwell on the fact that T. V. A. has not been a success so far as establishing a yardstick for measuring the achievements of the private power companies is concerned. We are left with no better measuring stick than the guess of a biased bureaucratic organization.

Testimony of Prof. Edward L. Moreland, before the T. V. A. Investigating Committee, indicated that the T. V. A. has no yardstick at all-that by improper accounting methods T. V. A. has presented an inaccurate and distorted picture of its own capital costs of production.

The thought that a government-operated business could compare favorably with a privately owned and operated business is not in harmony with experience and sound judgment. The experience of the Federal Government with the railroads during the World War was not a happy one, and the same has been true of the adventures of the Government into business. Bureaucracies do not lend themselves to economy, and the T. V. A. is no exception. I am convinced that the T. V. A. is an unnecessary and unwarranted burden on American taxpayers.

Mr. President, we have gone into the business of buying cotton, wheat, and other commodities, and the more legislation that has been enacted to help the farmers and the more the regulation by the Federal Government, the worse off the farmers have become, the greater has been the loss in agriculture, and generally to the business economy of our country. What we want is more individualism and less bureaucracy. We are going toward socialism too fast, and as we are going toward it so we are leaving the trail of disaster behind us.

I should like to call attention to an editorial printed in the Philadelphia Inquirer under date of November 19, 1938. It is a very enlightening editorial, and I ask that it be printed in the Record at this point, as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

T. V. A. AS A TAXPAYERS' BURDEN

The estimate of Edward L. Moreland, dean of the engineering department of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, that T. V. A.'s power program when completed will produce a deficit of $10,352,000 a year merits the thoughtful consideration of all American taxpavers.

If the T. V. A. operates at this huge annual deficit when all its

If the T. V. A. operates at this huge annual deficit when all its 11 dams are in working order, the Government will have to make up the loss. But the Government has no money of its own for this purpose. It will be the taxpayers, already heavily burdened, who will be called upon to make good T. V. A.'s red ink.

Dean Moreland's figures presented to the congressional committee investigating T. V. A. naturally are disputed by Government spokesmen. But the engineering expert, defending his estimate, adds that if T. V. A. had to pay all the taxes, interest, and other costs which utility companies must meet, its annual deficit would be, not $10,352,000, but $20,999,000.

Whatever the accuracy of these figures, the cost to the taxpayers of the stupendous $510,000,000 Government power empire springing up in the Tennessee Valley should be accorded more careful analysis than it has had.

It is a fact that T. V. A. has received substantial Government careful analysis than it has had.

It is a fact that T. V. A. has received substantial Government benefits in the way of lower taxes and other costs which private companies have to pay. But the taxpayers have paid—and are still paying—the bill to bring T. V. A. into existence. If, in addition to all these charges, the taxpayers are to be soaked millions a year to pay for T. V. A.'s operating deficits, where is the gain to the Nation in this vast Federal power plant and its competition with private industry? with private industry?

For when all is said and done, T. V. A. is shaping up not only as another unnecessary burden on American taxpayers but as a gigantic destroyer of private enterprise.

Mr. KING. Representative May, Member of Congress from Kentucky, and as I recall, chairman of the committee before which the T. V. A. is now lodged, stated two or three Viewed from such a political doctrine (that of Jeffersonian Democrats), the Tennessee Valley Authority and all its works must be judged as a positive destructive force of democracy, a cancerous growth in the heart of the living, breathing body of our political life, a cancer to which the legislative knife quickly must be applied lest its malignant tendrils overwhelm the land.

That is rather a strong statement, but nevertheless it emphasizes the point of view of many Americans in their condemnation of the intrusion of the National Government into the affairs of private life and into business activities.

One of the indefensible provisions of the proposed amendments to the T. V. A. Act is that which removes the last vestige of congressional control over the manner in which the $100,000,000 T. V. A. bonds may be dispensed.

It has been admitted by Senators supporting the bill that the bonds will be guaranteed by the Government; and yet the T. V. A. seems to be endowed with almost unlimited power. It is an imperium in imperio, a government by itself, not to be touched or controlled by the Federal or State Governments.

It would be legal, under this language, for T. V. A. to build factories, railroads, operate farms, and, indeed, to engage in all forms of private or corporate business.

In view of the record of careless expenditures by the T. V. A.—see United States General Accounting Office annual reports, 1934, 1937-which I have examined, there is little assurance that, unless expenditures by T. V. A. are subjected to the routine scrutiny of the Appropriations Committees of Congress, these bonds may not at any time be issued for the expansion of this inland power empire.

Under the language of the proposed amendments of the T. V. A. the Authority would have a nest egg of $55,000,000 which it could dispose as it pleases either for construction of new dams beyond appropriations by Congress or expenditure for duplicating transmission lines and other electric facilities for the purpose of creating a value-depressing pressure on property it eventually intends to purchase at its own price. It is claimed that the T. V. A. has done that in the past; there is no reason to believe that it has changed its policies.

I am reminded now of the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] a few moments ago, and I speak of it not, however, by way of criticism. He called attention to the fact that the bonds and stocks of some of these private companies had been depressed. Of course they have been depressed. When there is a threat by the Federal Government of paralleling their lines, building power plants, and interfering with their patrons, obviously the market value of the bonds and stocks of those would fall and the owners would suffer losses. If the Senator from Tennessee is engaged in an important enterprise in his own State and the Federal Government sets up an agency to enter into competition with him, it is certain that his property would be depressed in value, and stocks and bonds issued by him and in his enterprise, would be greatly depressed in value.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bonds in question were issued many, many years ago and the preferred stock was issued many years ago, and both bonds and stocks fell below par many, many years ago. Under the proposal made by the Senator from Nebraska the bonds have gone to par or above and the preferred stock has gone to par or above, because both the bonds and the preferred stock will be paid in full. In addition to that, if the measure introduced by the Senator from Nebraska is passed, the common stock owners will receive a price which will be entirely satisfactory to those who own and control the company themselves. Mr. Willkie-I do not know what his official position is-who is in real control of the company which is doing the selling, went before the House committee and testified openly that he was very anxious for the bill to pass.

Mr. KING. It is quite likely that Mr. Willkie is desirous of the passage of the bill before us. The Government has been opposing his company for several years and doubtless it and its stockholders have reached the conclusion that a further contest with a powerful government would be unavailing. Undoubtedly corporations have issued stocks and bonds which have been subjected to wide fluctuations in market prices and losses have been sustained by the owners of securities because of the market conditions. Corporations have met with reverses as have individuals, and securities of corporations have proven to be static or free from wide fluctuations. They rise and fall with business and economic changes. It is a significant fact, though, that where organizations discover the Federal Government authorizing enormous appropriations and commitments their properties-stocks and bonds-are subjected to wide fluctuations in value. And if the Government is a competitor and seeks to acquire plants and going concerns, the stockholders will be, in many instances, quite willing to dispose of the same to the Government. Individuals realize that they are at a disadvantage when in competition with the Government. The Federal Treasury is a factor or force which they feel unable to meet. However, if the Government enters the field of private enterprise and makes enormous appropriations, the day may come, as it has come to other governments, that its credit may be impaired and its bonds fall in value.

Mr. President, all this money appropriated for the T. V. A. could be used without further authorization by Congress, and even contrary to the expressed will of Congress. I am speaking of the $100,000,000 bond issue authorized by law. For example, had Congress, after lengthy hearings and extensive debate, refused—as it very nearly did—appropriations for the continuation of construction of the Gilbertsville Dam and for beginning of construction of Watts bar dam, under the language of this proposed amendment, T. V. A. could have flouted the will of Congress, issued $17,000,000 worth of bonds, as it would have a legal right to do, and then proceed with the construction specifically disapproved by Congress.

The Senator from Texas recently invited attention to the fact that there was no provision for taxation to pay interest on the bonds, and there is no limitation whatever on the Tennessee Valley Authority, which is a law unto itself with respect to the issue of these particular bonds.

No vaild excuse has been offered for the wide latitude thus accorded the Authority in the disposition of the $100,000,000 war chest. It is true that the pending authorization eliminates a previous bond issue authorization for $50,000,000 granted by Congress in amendments of August 1936. That authorization extended only to the purpose of T. V. A. construction and did not specifically authorize its use for purchase of existing facilities. However, the justifications upon which were predicted the 1935 $50,000,000 construction bond authorization have since largely disappeared. Certainly in view of facts since disclosed as to T. V. A. operations by the recent congressional investigation it is highly improbable that Congress would not be so liberal as it was in 1935.

So long as T. V. A. can proceed to build up or buy as it chooses without authorization of Congress it would be pointless for the Appropriations Committee to continue to go through the motions of considering whether or not it shall grant funds to T. V. A. in the annual Budget appropriation. In the event of failure of Congress to meet the financial requests of T. V. A. the Authority can proceed to issue bonds to make up any budgetary deficiency created by an economyminded Congress-if such a Congress should be found.

Surrender by Congress of its power over the purse strings to an independent Federal agency violates every standard of sound public policy. The power of the purse has been the essential weapon of free democracy against the usurpation of the Executive throughout history.

The cash requirements of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. purchase should limit the demand of T. V. A. to the specific amount required to accomplish the only stated purpose for which this bond issue is asked, especially at a time when the national debt has passed the $40,000,000,000 mark and is rapidly approaching the legal debt ceiling of 45

If in the future it has further requirements of similar nature the Authority may present its requests in due course and, after hearings in the customary manner, Congress can pass upon the merits of its proposals. Any other course means that Congress presents T. V. A. with a blank check of from $80,000,000 to $60,000,000 on the Treasury of the United States, to be used in any manner the T. V. A. sees

The opposition to these amendments and to the T. V. A. springs from two wholly separate sources. The first and most important factor is the intrusion upon our body politic of an alien type of Federal agency, based on the strangely foreign conception that the function of government is not only government but that the Federal Government should enter into the business of supplying its citizens with goods and services in competition with and duplication of the goods and services of its own citizens and taxpayers. If the T. V. A. is to be accepted as performing a legitimate function of government, then it is only a matter of how far we want to go along the same road before we arrive at pure socialism.

The second source of opposition to the T. V. A. type of Federal activity is economic. It has been demonstrated time and again that navigation on the Tennessee River would be better off without any T. V. A. than with the sort of alleged "navigation improvement" as the salvation of that region's transportation problems.

As to flood control, it has been amply and repeatedly demonstrated that in cases of big floods the works of T. V. A. are worse than useless, probably aggravating conditions. This despite the fact that the impounded waters of T. V. A. will create a still-water floor covering more area than some of the largest floods in the history of our country. Only by charging off immense sums to the functions of flood control and navigation-plus freedom from taxation and other Government privileges-has T. V. A. arrived at a capital base upon which it can pretend to earn interest on its power investments. Only by bookkeeping not defensible, in my view, has T. V. A. established "yardstick" rates that have influenced citizen competitors to sell at T. V. A.'s figure.

By means of an improper yardstick it has destroyed the greatest single taxpayer in the State of Tennessee, the private utilities, which pays to State and Federal Governments $5,000,000 annually. The gain from this victory is announced as a $4,000,000 annual rate reduction in Tennessee or a net loss to the public of $1,000,000 annually. This sale, moreover, points the way to a grave danger to the coal and railroad industry in displacement of steam generation of power by rail-hauled coal.

The T. V. A. purchase of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. constitutes probably the greatest single invasion of the legitimate market for coal by subsidized water power ever attempted by the Federal Government. The closing, except for stand-by purposes, of the Tennessee Electric Power Co.'s steam plants means the permanent annual loss of 203,000 tons

T. V. A.'s purchase of its private competitors relieved that agency of an increasingly embarrassing position in which it stood before the public as the destroyer of the savings of small investors. Even more important to T. V. A., the purchase removed costly competition which was already occupying and serving the only market available for the disposal of T. V. A. power.

Elimination of these two impediments to its progress appears only to have created additional problems equally embarrassing.

The new problems-chiefly work displacement in the mining and transportation of coal, and displacement of taxeshave become immediately urgent because of the purchases. Since the creation of T. V. A. these problems have always been in the picture as latent difficulties sure to plague T. V. A. whenever that agency succeeded in acquiring markets for its power either by purchase or by the longer route of duplication and slow strangulation of its competitors.

If T. V. A. today should renounce its deals with the Tennessee Electric Power Co. and other companies the problems of work and tax displacement would only be postponed to such time as its private competitors could be driven out of business under fire of T. V. A.'s subsidized competition.

Purchase of private systems by T. V. A. means large displacement of coal-consuming generating plants. Important segments of the dwindling market of the distressed coal miner are thus forever destroyed. Since 35 percent of all rail tonnage is coal the direct effect on railroad labor is apparent.

Even before T. V. A. had purchased the Tennessee Electric Power Co.'s properties it had announced an ultimate production schedule of 8,160,000,000 kilowatt-hours of "workless power" annually. By this purchase it has included additional generating capacity in five dams totaling 138,000 kilowatt-hours, and it is reasonable to suppose that with this addition T. V. A. will generate close to 10,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours annually of "workless power." This is the equivalent of 7,100,000 working days each year which would have been required to produce the same quantity of power from coal.

Mr. President, Mr. John D. Battle, executive secretary of the National Coal Association, recently made a statement which I ask to have inserted in the Record at this point as part of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the statement may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The statement is as follows:

The bituminous-coal industry is the largest single employer of labor in the United States today with the exception of the Federal Government and excepting also the railroads. There are more than a million persons, directly and indirectly, employed by the coal industry, and that means probably not less than 5,000,000 persons who draw their support in some form from the mining of bituminous coal. * * *

Let me remind you also that 45 cents out of every railroad revenue dollar goes directly into the pockets of railroad labor and that at least 60 cents out of every dollar received by the coal producers go indirectly into the miners' pay envelopes. * * *

I approach a discussion with you of the T. V. A. with feelings of sadness rather than anger. The T. V. A. made glowing promises, has spent large sums here in the Tennessee Valley, has made a temporary bonanza for many persons and many local businesses. It is not surprising that it has made many friends and acquired many champions. champions.

But there is going to be a day of reckoning and, I believe, a sad awakening. The capital expenditures for new dams are not going to go on forever. I may say in passing that if Congress heeds the present plans presented by the coal industry the construction of new dams will come to a halt very soon. Navigation may prove to new dams will come to a halt very soon. Navigation may prove to be a utopian dream.

The effectiveness of T. V. A.'s boasted flood control remains debatable. T. V. A.'s promise of cheap fertilizer for the farmer through large-scale production of superphosphates is still in the twilight zone. What then will remain when T. V. A. stands completed—a great Government-operated, largely laborless, hydroelectric power system distributing electricity at low rate, thanks to the subsidies from the Federal Treasury—and a ruined coal industry, with an army of permanently unemployed coal miners.

The bituminous-coal industry has strongly opposed T. V. A.'s hydroelectric power program from its inception. This opposition rests upon the simple fact that the large increments of electric power that T. V. A. has undertaken to generate and market must inevitably destroy many existing outlets for coal as well as preempt large future markets for coal in the T. V. A. area.

The loss of these outlets for coal and the resulting closing of mines and the permanent large-scale elimination of jobs in the production and transportation of coal is unfortunate and disastrous under any circumstances. It is doubly hard to bear when, as the under any circumstances. It is doubly hard to bear when, as the case is here, it comes about through Government action with the case is nere, it comes about through Government action with the aid of subsidies out of the Federal Treasury, and when, in reality, coal offers a more economical medium today for the generation of additional increments of electric power in the Tennessee Valley than the T. V. A. substitute, if the cost of the latter were to be computed at its true total.

The extent of this displacement of coal by T. V. A. bydro power The extent of this displacement of coal by T. V. A. hydro power and the resulting loss in jobs and in wages is a matter of very simple arithmetic. The coal equivalent of 1,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity is 710 tons. That is the quantity of bituminous coal, at the rate of 1.52 pounds per kilowatt-hour, required to generate that quantity of electricity. T. V. A. reports that it sold 806,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy in the last 6 months of 1938. But that is only a starter. It projects its annual output upon the completion of what it described as its 10-dam system at 8,100,000,000 kilowatt-hours. Simple multiplication of 8,100 by 710 is 5,751,000 kilowatt-hours. Simple multiplication of 8,100 by 710 is 5,751,000 tons of coal prospectively displaced by T. V. A. hydro power.

It has been estimated—and the estimate never challenged—that 1 ton of bituminous coal, by the time it reaches its final destination, represents 1 day's work and wages for one man. At that rate T. V. A.'s complete electric output in terms of coal will destroy 5,751,000 mandays of employment annually.

T. V. A.'s complete electric output in terms of coal will destroy 5,751,000 man-days of employment annually.

At all events, we know for a certainty that the coal tonnage as above stated represents more than $11,000,000 to the producers, of which 60 percent is labor pay rolls and almost $13,000,000 in railroad freight revenues, of which 45 percent is labor pay rolls. So what we are dealing with in this situation is a potential direct wage loss of more than $12,000,000 annually in the mines and on the railroads. The T. V. A. has now passed from the realm of theory into the realm of fact. It is too late now to undo the mischief already done. The immediate question now is simply how far T. V. A. shall be permitted to extend and to expand its hydro power facilities and to what extent its prospective annihilation of coal markets may be checked and limited by appropriate action of the Congress. be checked and limited by appropriate action of the Congres

Mr. KING. The reasons set forth by the coal-industry spokesman appear to be sufficient to justify Congress in insisting that before future purchases are made of private properties by the T. V. A. the Authority shall come before it with specific proposals and present them at committee hearings for formal discussion and appropriate action. If the T. V. A. proposals are of doubtful value to the Authority and to the Federal investment, surely Congress is entitled to know all the facts and have power to disapprove.

The same reasoning presented by the coal industry applies with equal force to the railroad industry.

As a navigation aid T. V. A. is hardly expected to seriously compete with railroads, except perhaps in the transportation of petroleum products. But because of the existence of potential water competition, shippers can demand and receive from the Interstate Commerce Commission a lower rail rate. Thus T. V. A. will cut into the already lean revenues of the railroads, which are the greatest single customer of the coal industry, the electric utilities being second.

The injury to coal's second largest customer, the power companies, must, of course, also damage the railroad industry.

In 1936, $1,500,000,000 worth of coal was hauled by rail, accounting for 36.9 percent of railroad revenues. In that year private power companies consumed more than 10 percent of the total bituminous coal production.

Equally as serious as the situation confronting the coal industry due to the loss of substantial markets is the effect of these purchases on the taxpayers of the State of Tennessee and of the Federal Government, among whom the coal producers are an important group.

The simple fact is that the Federal taxpayer must now shoulder an additional burden of $1,200,000 annually, which had previously been the revenue obtained from the Tennessee utility companies involved in purchases by T. V. A. or its municipal or rural subsidiaries. These figures for 1937 were taken from sworn testimony admitted in the Federal court in the so-called Nineteen Company suit. They include taxes of $653,524; capital-stock tax of $54,722; 3-percent gross energy tax of $385,850; social-security taxes of $78,719; and other taxes of $31,531. At current Federal interest rates this revenue is sufficient to service annually $50,000,000 of the T. V. A. debt. Before T. V. A. is permitted to claim honest yardstick rates and "self-liquidating" capacity, at least, this sum should be returned to the Federal Treasury each year. As yet no legislation has been suggested for the relief of the Federal taxpayer in this respect.

The situation confronting the Tennessee taxpayer, however, is much more acute. A study of pending tax losses due to T. V. A. purchases prepared by the Tennessee Taxpayers Association shows that:

Replacement of State taxes heretofore paid by privately owned electric utilities which have passed or are about to pass into public ownership will require $1,080,000 annually.

Replacement of municipal taxes heretofore paid by privately owned electric utilities upon distribution systems now to be operated by municipalities or quasimunicipal bodies will require $1,027,348 annually.

Replacements of county and school districts' taxes which have heretofore been paid upon distribution systems now to be operated by public agencies will require $727,794 annually.

Replacement of both county and municipal taxes heretofore paid by privately owned utilities on land, dams, generating facilities and transmission lines to be owned by the T. V. A. and other public agencies will require $676,953

Total losses to the State of Tennessee and its political subdivisions, due to actual or pending sales, from tax revenues previously paid by private utilities which now require replacement amount to $3,512,095 annually.

These figures speak for themselves and demonstrate the injury which the taxpayers of Tennessee will suffer by reason of the T. V. A. policy.

Perhaps the authors of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act little realized the extent to which their creature would expand. Certainly nothing contained in the act provides for this tax dilemma. It is true that T. V. A. must, under the present law, pay 5 percent of the gross proceeds of power, sold from Tennessee dams, and 21/2 percent additional on extraseasonal power produced and sold from Alabama dams with water stored in Tennessee reservoirs. T. V. A. estimates that with the new properties acquired the gross sales of power by T. V. A. will total between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000 annually. Assuming that Tennessee should receive the tax "contribution" of 5 percent, plus the small extraseasonal power-sale contribution of 21/2 percent, the total would equal about $350,000, or one-tenth of the State tax loss involved in the purchase. The total tax contribution of T. V. A., however, must be prorated among the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky on a proportional scale not yet announced. Moreover, under the present law this contribution is paid directly to the State, leaving no remedy to the counties and municipalities, many of which are facing financial disaster, according to the study of the Tennessee Taxpayers Association. The Tennessee coal mining industry is now to be burdened with the additional costs.

Various suggestions have been presented to remedy this situation. As the Supreme Court recently reversed precedents by a decision which permits States to levy income taxes on salaries of Federal employees, the State of Georgia enacted a law which now stands a fair chance of approval in the Supreme Court. The Georgia law, as I understand its terms, requires that properties of corporations and agencies of the Federal Government-

Engaged in proprietary, as distinguished from governmental activities, shall be subject to ad valorem taxation in this State (except insofar as the Constitution and laws of the United States may prohibit the taxation) at the same rate and in the same manner as the property of private corporations owning property in this State engaged in similar businesses are taxed; and all laws relating to the ad valorem taxation of such private corporations shall apply.

It seems to me that we should in the legislation which we are now considering provide proper guaranties that Tennessee and her political subdivisions and the other States within this great imperial domain shall be recompensed for the loss which they have sustained by the Federal Government becoming a great power organization instead of being restricted to its legitimate functions as a Government.

However, if this law-referring to the Georgia law-is challenged by T. V. A., years may elapse before the litigation is determined by the Supreme Court, and the involved States meanwhile will lose badly in needed revenues.

Mr. President, when the Federal Government embarks upon private business, certainly the law which was enacted by the State of Georgia, treating it as a proprietor and placing it in the same category as individuals, should be respected by the Congress.

When the distinguished member of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Black, spoke in this body on March 13, 1928, he used language which I shall now quote. I think it was a sound legislative statement and ought to be a sound judicial statement. I read from the Congressional Record.

When the Government goes into business in competition with a private individual there (at Muscle Shoals) why should not the Government be taxed? Why should it be given an unfair advantage?

Why should the Government, which sells power in Alabama, pay no taxes, although Alabama collects taxes from other industries engaged in the same business?

Sooner or later it will take away from Alabama the right even Sooner or later it will take away from Alabama the right even to tax them, because if you impose a heavy tax on one and do not impose it on another, sooner or later the heavily taxed industry will fall and go cut of business.

Therefore, we insist upon this principle:
First, because it is fair and right, I insist that no government and no state and no municipality has the right to engage in competition with private business without newtre the semesour.

competition with private business without paying the same amount of taxes that private business pays.

When I say that, do not understand me to say that I always oppose municipal or Government operation; but I do say that it is not fair, not right, and not just to require a citizen to do business and pay taxes and put up next door to him his own Government which pays no taxes.

The drafters of the original T. V. A. Act anticipated the legal obstacles of a Federal agency submitting to local taxation, by stipulating that T. V. A. should "contribute" a fixed share of its gross income to States in which it operates in lieu of taxes. The same principle can be extended.

Since its program of duplicating private electric facilities was launched in '33 the Tennessee Valley Authority has built thousands of miles of transmission lines and spent millions of dollars in direct duplication of the properties of privately owned utilities. That such a policy is unnecessary and costly is urged as the reason for this legislation by the Senator from Nebraska, the "father of T. V. A.." who now takes the position that T. V. A. must end what he describes as "useless and unnecessary, as well as destructive, competition" (p. 4, S. Rept. No. 189).

There is nothing, however, in the pending bills in the House which would limit the Tennessee Valley Authority from continuing the same tactics of using threatened duplication to bring additional private owners to their knees and to sell out at the Authority's price. In fact, about $45,000,000 will be required by the Authority to complete the presently contemplated purchase, leaving it with a $55,000,000 blank check on the Treasury of the United States with which to duplicate or expand without further authorization by the Congress of the United States. Although the "TEPCO" deal involves $78,600,000, large cities, such as Chattanooga, Nashville, and some 200 incorporated towns and villages and 200 unincorporated towns and villages will purchase distribution facilities for which T. V. A.'s bonds will not be required.

It would seem to be too late, now, for T. V. A. to change its plan to buy out its chief competitor. It might be regarded as bad faith and it would prove no solution to the problems here presented, since T. V. A. would merely continue the process of destruction of TEPCO by duplication. Nevertheless, before congressional approval of this bond issue is granted, it is apparent that there should be incorporated very definite limitations as to the use of this money. The bills should be amended to provide:

(a) That funds authorized shall be used for the purpose for which they are requested, viz, purchase of the TEPCO properties.

(b) That further duplication or purchase of existing private facilities shall be undertaken by T. V. A. only after specific authorization by Congress.

(c) That T. V. A. shall contribute its full share of taxes or a just contribution in lieu of taxes to Federal, State, and local Governments on all its income-producing properties; and that in its power sale contracts to public agencies it shall include a mandatory provision requiring such agencies to make full local and State tax payments.

With the permission of the Senate, I will insert in the RECORD a statement on page 4 of Senate Report No. 189, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

NAVIGATION

Mr. KING. Mr. J. A. Krug, Chief Power Planning Engineer of T. V. A., told the special congressional committee investigating T. V. A. that if the same allocation theory were used as to Gilbertsville as was applied to the other 10 dams there would be a total of $103,689,000 investment in the dam, and navigation would be charged with $11,139,000 of investment in facilities useful for navigation plus 32.2 percent of the investment in multiple-use facilities, a total of approximately $27,000,000 for navigation.

I think it proper, however, to call attention to the study of Army engineers of the Tennessee River and their recommendation that development of the river for navigation purposes should be by 32 low dams, which would cost $75,000,000 (House Doc. 328, 71st Cong., 2d sess., pp. 98–100). The recommendations of the Army engineers were enacted into law by the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930. Many of the sites of the low dams have been submerged by the vast power dams built by T. V. A., but the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for the fiscal year 1938 shows that the Federal navigation project for the development of the river below Pickwick Landing Dam includes five low navigation dams. These dams show an estimated cost of $13,485,000, or less than half the cost which will be allocated to navigation in the construction of the Gilbertsville Dam.

Let me call attention to the size of the proposed lake to be formed by the Gilbertsville Dam. It will be 184 miles long, 7 miles wide at the widest place, and deep enough to accommodate the largest ocean ship. There is ample evidence to demonstrate that such a large lake is too hazardous in rough weather for the safe operation of the low, flat, steel barges now in use on the Ohio and Mississippi, which are but a few feet above the water line when loaded. There could be no chain of continuous navigation between the Tennessee and the Ohio and the Mississippi system, and undoubtedly there would have to be transfers of cargo to special types of cargo boats which experience would sooner or later require.

If there is doubt that navigation on such a large lake is hazardous, a glance at the experiences on Lake Pepin on the upper Mississippi will, I think, suffice to convince Senators that there is at least potential danger.

Lake Pepin is an enlargement of the Mississippi River forming a lake 23 miles in length and from 1 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in width, with depths ranging from 25 to 35 feet. Such a body of water can hardly be called a lake in comparison with the proposed lake at the Gilbertsville Dam. Yet it has been found necessary to construct three harbors of refuge on Pepin Lake for the protection of traffic.

In rough weather the waves on the lake are so large that all vessels are compelled to seek refuge in harbors. In 1890 one of the greatest river disasters in the history of the country occurred on Lake Pepin when the oceanlike waves overwhelmed the decks of the steamboat Sea Wing, and the vessel was destroyed and nearly 100 human lives were lost. The waves are even dangerous to high-decked packet vessels, and it takes but little imagination to know what the result would be to a barge line of low, flat, steel barges used in river traffic.

It is the opinion of many who are familiar with river navigation that the Gilbertsville Reservoir will not only not help in transportation, but will be an actual barrier to navigation. It is their opinion that the high waves natural in such a large body of water would founder the low freeboard river boats, as have been developed for high efficiency and economy of transportation on the 9-foot channels of the Monongahela, the Ohio, the Mississippi, and Missouri Rivers,

I ask permission to insert in the Record a statement by Capt. Donald T. Wright, editor of the Waterways Journal of St. Louis, the authoritative trade journal of the inland transportation industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be inserted in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

Congress, should it study anew the authorization granted for construction of the Gilbertsville Dam, may or may not conclude that it was ill-advised. But the popular view, albeit the practical view of actual river navigators, holds that the T. V. A. officials are too inexperienced in matters of river navigation to grasp the implications that the Gilbertsville Dam carry with it distinctly implications that the Gilbertsville Dam carry with it distinctly threatening to its success. I do not say that the T. V. A. officials are inexperienced in matters of stream flow, flood control, and the water generation of power. But from the first inception of the T. V. A., when I learned the names of its guiding officials, I was skeptical of their ability to solve the navigation problems of the Tennessee River. I then held, and I do now, the highest respect for these men in the field of their lifetime endeavors. But as far as I know to this day their endeavors prior to 1933 had never dealt directly with the practical problems of creating an integrated navigation system for the 36 States that lie wholly or in part within navigation system for the 36 States that lie wholly or in part within the Mississippi Basin.

If the Tennessee Valley Authority, with unprecedented grants of latitude and money, has failed to integrate the Tennessee River into the national, standardized, and connected chain of inland waterways, it poses very gravely the question whether the Authority method for dealing with rivers should in future be extended.

Incidentally, there are three things—navigation, power, and flood control—that simply do not work together in the same system of dams. Nor do two of them, tied together, pull any too steadily in their double harness.

As for triple harness--well, we must leave that to the T. V. A., which already has expended some $200,000,000 to find out.

At first glance high dams for rivers appear to hold marvelous possibilities. T. V. A. officials often wax eloquent in describing High dams make for few dams.

Thus commerce is not delayed as often for lockage as is the case on rivers like the Ohio, improved by a series of low, frequent dams. High dams create vast lakes.

Thus recreational facilities are provided, and wildlife may be propagated.

High dams, besides creating deep water for navigation, hold back a large head of water useful for the turning of power generators.

High dams, if kept empty—and the word "if" should be emphasized—may be used to hold back excessive rainfalls from flooding the lower valleys.

But high dams create wide and deep lakes. On this score the results for river navigation are unfavorable. Such bodies of water have, in fact, scores of liabilities even after these are deducted from the sum total of their assets. For river-type boats and barges they create the hazard of rough water, long rolling swells, or actual it make provision for hand operation of the lock. Therefore, be-fore the lock could again be operated after the storm was over, it was first necessary to remove the electric motors and dry them out was first necessary to remove the electric motors and dry them out as a result of the wind-borne waves that in themselves represented a river navigation problem created by this dam.

Navigation was stopped there for 6 days; and in particular instances one towboat was delayed for 44 hours, and another for 22 hours. These, I gather, were T. V. A. boats, and no commercial navigation was delayed. Incidentally commercial navigation of the Tennessee River, except in certain short stretches, is very rare today above Muscle Shoals. But should such navigation try to develop on the large scale suggested by Mr. Lilienthal in his Knox-ville address of last month, this type of delay may be expected to be very common and, needless to say, very dampening upon its growth. When the waves mentioned were at their worst, their height was estimated at from 8 to 12 feet, and lockmen could not height was estimated at from 8 to 12 feet, and lockmen could not stand on the lock walls.

Mr. KING. Certainly, if three harbors of refuge are necessary to protect river traffic on a small lake only 23 miles, 21/2 miles wide at the widest point, and 35 feet at the deepest point, conditions on the Gilbertsville Lake will be very serious during period of storm. Will it be possible for barges then in the middle of a lake, 7 miles wide at the widest point, to reach harbor refuges, even were such refuges available? Can adequate harbor facilities be provided? As far as I know, however, T. V. A. has made no studies of the effect of wind and wave on river traffic, nor has it included in its cost, to my information, any estimates for harbors of refuge.

Mr. President, I am opposed, as I have indicated, to the amendment now pending, as I was opposed to the original T. V. A. bill. My position today is fortified by the additional reason that the amendment, which is in the form of a bill heretofore passed by the Senate, is pending before a committee of the House of Representatives. I submit that it is an affront to that committee and to the legislative branch at the other end of the Capitol for the Senate to add by way of a rider the amendment which has been offered by my distinguished friend from Nebraska.

ADMINISTRATION OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT AND SOIL-CONSERVATION PROGRAM

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I regret to take the floor at this particular time to discuss a matter which is not pertinent to the measure pending before the Senate: but there have been going on in the State of New Mexico-and I am satisfied also in other sections of the Union-certain practices in connection with the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the soil-conservation program, and in recent months I have received so many letters from citizens of my State relating thereto that I feel compelled to lay before the Senate some of the things about which so much complaint is being made and because of which my correspondence is so heavily burdened.

The question is not altogether new. It has not arisen in the past few weeks, but the matters to which I refer have been going on over a long period of time. In my humble judgment, the farmers of my State have received very unfair and very unjust treatment, not altogether at the hands of the Agricultural Department. In fact, I am inclined to the belief that it is not the fault of the Agricultural Department that this particular matter arises, although blame is to be attached to the Department in the administration of the agricultural program.

In 1937, pursuant to laws enacted by Congress supposed to confer certain benefits upon the farmers of the country, the farmers of my State in practically every county where farming is carried on, and in my own county, particularly where they have dry-land farming, tried to follow practices laid down by the Department under the soil-conservation and agricultural adjustment programs.

I say they tried to follow those programs because it was impossible for any person to know exactly what should or should not be done. I make that statement advisedly, because I myself tried to ascertain from different agencies what was expected, and I received many different answers. I am quite sure errors were made by the farmers of my State, probably many errors. Perhaps they did not exactly comply with the program; but knowing the people of my State-who are no different from those in other States—I am convinced that whatever errors may have occurred were in the greater part, the vast, vast majority of instances, honest errors, and that the farmers believed they were complying with the program exactly as intended and exactly as laid down. As a matter of fact I am told that change after change was made in instructions, and no man could be certain as to what practice should be followed.

The matter was complicated. It was more or less difficult to know just what was to be expected, what practices should be termed "soil conservation practices," what crops could be planted, the measurement of lands, and other things that were all more or less new. Nevertheless, the farmers tried to cooperate. They carried on as best they could; and for their 1937 efforts they were paid what they were told they would receive and what they expected to receive, although in many instances the payments were delayed.

I have not the entire history of the matter; but, as I understand, months later the compliance sheets or records, or whatever they may be called, were sent to the General Accounting Office here in Washington. They finally reached the General Accounting Office, and the bookkeepers and auditors of that office went over the records with a finetooth comb, and in many instances decided that compliance had not occurred here and had not occurred there. When in one instance 160 acres of land, a quarter section, was shown to have been all cropland, the auditors in Washington said, "That is impossible. You cannot have 160 acres of cropland out of a quarter section, and therefore this farmer has falsified his record"; and they ruled that he should refund to the Government the payment for the proportion or part of the 160 acres which the auditors said could not have been cropland, notwithstanding the fact, startling as it may seem, that I can show the auditors in Washington by actual measurement that a quarter section of land sometimes consists of more than 160 acres. I can demonstrate by actual experience that tracts of land which are shown by Government surveys to contain 40 acres very frequently contain more than 40 acres and sometimes less than 40 acres. In the General Accounting Office, however, they say that is not true, and therefore that some farmer has falsified a record.

Mr. President, do not misunderstand me. If there has been any willful wrongdoing anywhere, by big farmer or by little farmer, certainly he should refund to the Government what he has been overpaid because of his willful violations of the prescribed practices. I venture to say, however, that there is not one case out of 100 or more in which there has been any willful violation.

All of this means, Mr. President—and this is what has happened—that after this wise examination and searching of records here in the General Accounting Office, after the auditing and the reauditing over and over again, the auditors decided that they would make no payments whatever for 1938 until they had gone out and checked and rechecked and reviewed and rereviewed and scanned once more, in the field and in the accounting offices, all the records of 1937 in many counties; and in many counties all payments for 1938 were suspended pending the checking and rechecking and investigation and reinvestigation over again.

Mr. President, it may not mean anything to those employed in the General Accounting Office to suspend payments due in 1938 all during that year, and down into 1939, and up to the present day, and still not make them. It may not mean anything to the auditors and checkers of that Office who draw their salaries twice a month. They may not understand that the farmers in my State, in many instances, have incurred obligations on the strength of the payments they expected to receive from the Government, and that they have not been able to meet their obligations because somebody in some office here in Washington suspects that they may have been overpaid in 1937, and therefore the payments for 1938 were held up, and have not been made. Instead of being made for 1938, the auditors now have wisely concluded, in many instances, that refunds should be made by the farmers for 1937, and they are not going to make the 1938 payments until they collect from the farmers the part which they say is overpayment for 1937. I use the expression "which they say" because in this instance the General Accounting Office, or wherever the fault is, has acted as prosecutor, as judge, and now as collector. The individual farmer has no place to go to assert any defense he may have, and to show that he complied in good faith and with honesty with the program in 1937. There is not a place in the world to which he can go to defend against the accusation and the charge that he was unfair and that he was overpaid. Arbitrarily he is informed today, "You were overpaid so much money in 1937, and therefore in 1938 and 1939 we will take out the payment that was due you in 1938."

I said in the beginning that it was unfair and unjust. I repeat that any system which arbitrarily assesses charges or refunds against individuals, and then collects them without the individuals having any day in court or any place to present their defense, is unfair and unjust.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRUMAN in the chair).
Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. As I understand, the local county committees, which determine whether or not the farmer has complied with the farm program, are selected by the farmers. Do not the farmers of whom the Senator speaks have an opportunity to appear before the local committee which they have participated in selecting?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I began my remarks or he would have understood. It is not a case of the local committee; in fact, I am discussing the payments made in 1937. Those payments were made to the farmers in my State, and I am satisfied there are some such farmers in the Senator's State. For 1937, after the local committee had reviewed the practices, after they had been approved by the local committee following the instructions given, in most instances, by the county agent, after they had been approved by the State committee, then they came to the Department of Agriculture and were approved in Washington and checks were actually issued and sent out. Then the records went over to the General Accounting Office, and the auditors and bookkeepers in the General Accounting Office said the farmers had not complied, that they had made mistakes, that there had been overplantings, that some soil-conservation practice was not in accordance with the "docket," as they called it, or something else, and that therefore the farmers had been overpaid, and the Government claimed refunds.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not hear the early part of the Senator's remarks. As I now understood, the complaint is against the practice of the General Accounting Office—

Mr. HATCH. It certainly is.

Mr. RUSSELL. In constituting itself as a supercourt to review and overrule the local committee, the State committee, and the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HATCH. That is exactly correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the Senator's complaint is well founded, and I hope there will be legislation to clear up these cases. A great many of them originated in 1937, and they are destroying the faith of the farmers in the fairness of the Government in dealing with them in the farm program.

Mr. HATCH. I am very glad the Senator from Georgia made the observation that the condition complained of is destroying the faith of the farmer in his Government. I have some letters before me now which bear out exactly what the Senator from Georgia has said, and I may digress at this point and read some excerpts from them.

The letter I hold in my hand is from a man I have known personally for many years. I know him to be a sincere, honest, upright American citizen. He wants very much to serve his Government, and he wanted to cooperate in the farm program, but he came in this class of cases, and to show how incensed the farmers become, I will read some of the language this man uses:

Hair splitting over turn rows, returning weeks of work to be all done again over some senseless form or a few feet of variance in measuring land, unwilling to take time-honored measurements or the United States U. S. R. S. surveys. One set of officials O. K. on compliance, only to have another set to require valuable crops plowed Office nit-wits that do not know a cotton stalk from a cocklebur sending out myriads of nonsensical, useless compliance forms which are carefully, painstakingly, and honestly observed, only to be sent back for some fancied or imaginable error. A well-established policy of chasing a man off the job just as soon as he learns it, thus nullifying all his work. Buck passing by everybody. No man given power to say "yes" and "no"; gross incompetency rampant; all power taken from our extension director; our county agent chased off the job; our State committee reduced to parrotlike men; our county committee elected by the farmers, who are mere cogs in the wheel of a merry-go-round.

The Government's promise to pay will no longer buy bread.

Subsidy payments cannot be used as security for bank loans.

Mr. President, there are more pitiful stories than that. Let me read a letter from Bellview, N. Mex., which happens to be in Curry County, the county in which I live:

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: I have received a notice that I was overpaid on my 1937 wheat allotment payment. I complied in every way for this payment and kept 70 acres of wheat out of production. My wheat made $8 an acre that year, and I therefore lost $560 for $263 rayment and now they claim I should have been paid only $263. I followed the county committee's instructions and they O. K.'d the practices. I will sure appreciate anything you can do about this. It is grossly unfair to the farmer.

I have many other letters of like tenor and purport, but here is an interesting one. This is from a man who lives in Grady, N. Mex., which is also in Curry County. This is the letter and the record sent to this man, of which he complains:

For 1937 you were paid $279.43. It is indicated that you should have been paid nothing, and have been overpaid $279.43.

That was the exact amount he received. I presume that man is grateful that no deficiency judgment is asked against him. Can Senators conceive of the Government going back and claiming a refund of every cent originally paid to a man? Yet that happened in Curry County, N. Mex.

A very illuminating letter was written to me from an adjoining county to mine in New Mexico by a lady. I am not sure that I know the lady, I think I do, but I do know something of what the farmers are faced with in the country from which she writes. I know something about the drought, and the grasshoppers, and all the things with which they have to contend. I know they have tried as faithfully as any people can try to comply with the entire agricultural program. This is the letter I received from this lady:

During the fall of each season the Department of Agriculture, through its county agent, calls meetings of farmers in each district to cutline farm program for wheat farmers. They make promises that if we leave out of production certain acreage, follow specified practices on seeding and cultivating land, we will receive so much practices on seeding and cultivating land, we will receive so much money for cooperation.

In the fall of 1936 I left out acreage and complied with all the practices specified by the Department of Agriculture, according to their officials, especially the county agent. They do not send book or docket so that we can post ourselves on the requirements, so we have to depend on what the county agent tells us is necessary to do.

Now, I am in receipt of letter from the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Royce Banks, acting State executive officer, copy of which is attached. I do not know just what discrepancies I am accused of, but as above stated I complied according to instructions, and if any discrepancy exists, the fault is with the Department of Agriculture in some of its offices and not with the farmer.

I did what I agreed to do, and the Government agreed to pay me

$452.72, and I do not think that I should be penalized in the sum

$452.72, and 1 do not think that I should be penalized in the sum of $248.28 for someone else's error.

If the Department of Agriculture is unable to administrate this program more efficiently than it has been, they will not have many cooperators left in this community. It appears they have almost as many employees as we have farmers, and it does seem they should be able to administrate this program with some degree of satisfaction to the farmers who are trying to cooperate with them.

I have here the copy that was sent to this lady telling her what her discrepancies were, the practices which she failed to observe, and for which the great Government of the United States has held up her 1938 payment until June 1, 1939, without forwarding it, in order that they may collect from her $200 which the Government of the United States. through some officer or clerk, says she was overpaid. is the discrepancy of which they say she is guilty? I will read what they say and ask if Senators of the United States assent to this. I see before me some of the brightest and most intelligent minds in the United States of America, and I ask Senators to listen to the notice this lady received, and tell me what she has been guilty of:

DEAR MRS. P.: On the basis of an audit conducted by the Department of Agriculture at the request of the Comptroller General of the United States, it has been determined that the original agricultural conservation program payment made to you for per-agricultural conservation program payment made to you for per-formance in 1937 was in error.

The investigation disclosed the following discrepancies in the preparation of applications for payment in your county:

(1) Soil-depleting bases were assigned to farms in excess of the crop land.

(2) Cotton bases were not established on the basis of cotton history but were assigned to persons growing cotton in 1937 regardless of such history.

The first two discrepancies set forth relate to cotton. I know that county very well, and there is some cotton raised in Quay County, N. Mex., but I venture to guess that this lady does not raise cotton. She was raising wheat, as she states in her letter. But the first two discrepancies relate to cotton.

(3) Arbitrary changes were made in bases and yields.

Who made arbitrary changes in bases and yields? What does that mean, I ask the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have always felt the Senator from New Mexico was a friend of mine, but he has propounded a question which I do not think it would be possible for any individual to answer without knowledge of the facts.

Mr. HATCH. Yet this lady was told that because she has done this she must pay back to the Government of the United States some two hundred dollars.

(4) Soil-building practices were not properly classified according to the regulations.

That makes just as much sense to me as the other did.

(5) Two practices carried out on the same acreage were reported as separate acreages.

That has some semblance of reason. I think we might be able to gather some idea from it.

- (6) Certain acreages as reported for payment did not agree with the field supervisor's original report.
- I do not know what great weight should be given to a field supervisor's original report. It implies that he might have made a subsequent report, which perhaps did not agree with the original report. Senators can speculate on what that language means. I do not know.
- (7) The data reported under the 1937 agricultural conservation and cotton price adjustment programs differed when it should have been identical.

I do not know what that means.

And then finally comes this sentence, which makes all that has gone before clear and certain, and this woman can now tell exactly with what she is charged. Senators, somewhere those of us who studied a little law have heard that even a criminal is entitled to know the charge he must meet, So they are going to make it clear and certain that this woman who has violated these practices to such an extent that she is penalized more than $200 shall know with what she is charged. Therefore the letter says:

One or more of the above discrepancies were found on your application for payment.

Senators may take their choice, as this woman must take her choice, and read the letter from beginning to end and say that somewhere in the list is one or perhaps more things she has not done or which she should have done. When the charges are read she still can only guess as to how she failed to comply.

Thus, Mr. President, is presented a picture which I do not like to contemplate. Citizens of the United States are sent such letters and have amounts charged up against them, and their payments withheld for a year or 18 months. I have protested for months against such procedure. I learned about it last fall before I returned to my home. I took the matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture. I have taken it up with the western division. I have done so by letter, by telegram, and in person, and yet letters such as that I just read continue to go forward, and the 1938 payments have not been made. Government officials are still holding them up and demanding refunds, with no chance on the part of the—I almost said the defendant—no chance on the part of the farmer to present what defense he might have.

Mr. President, I believed so strongly that the Department was wrong that early in the session I introduced a bill requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to make payments for 1938 and previous years without regard to any audits which had been made, and to make them immediately. I included some other provisions in that bill which perhaps have delayed its passage. So soon as we can obtain a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I expect to offer an amendment which will strike everything out of that bill except the provision requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to make the payments for 1938 and to do it now.

If there has been wrongdoing, if there has been willful violation of practices in the collection of money which should not have been paid to the farmer, the Government of the United States is able to go into the courts of the land, if necessary, and recover it, where the citizen would have a chance to present some defense. These charges and assessments should not be made here in Washington or in some office where the farmer has no chance to present his side of the story.

Mr. President, it is a simple maxim, one as old as Anglo-Saxon law, that every person is entitled to his day in court. In the present instance not only is the Government dealing with one of its citizens, but the citizen is absolutely helpless. If it were a case between individuals; if someone owed me a certain amount and attempted to deduct from it, or if I made certain claims against him, we could go into court and fight it out and have the issue determined as to who was right and who was wrong. But in a contest between the Government and a citizen no such privilege is accorded to the citizen. He must take what the Government sees fit to give, which throws all the greater responsibility upon the officials of the Government.

I do not know how much money is involved in these overpayments or claims for refunds, but I have a very deep conviction that whatever sum is involved, the Government of the United States can better afford to lose it than to destroy the faith and confidence of any number of our citizens in their Government.

Mr. President, I hope the Department of Agriculture will see fit by some method or in some manner to make these 1938 payments now, and disregard its claims for refund until some tribunal can be established where the farmer may be permitted to show that he did in fact and in truth comply with the program.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 572) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense.

AMENDMENT OF SECOND LIBERTY BOND ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, personally I dislike to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. I favored the legislation when it was before the Senate some weeks ago, and I would vote for it now if it were before us on its own footing and not as an amendment to the pending bill. I was delighted when those representing the T. V. A. and the power companies in Tennessee reached a reasonable agreement. It goes without saying that since I was for the legislation when it was previously before the Senate, I very much hoped it would pass the House. However, I am still one of the rare specimens who believe in orderly legislation.

The bill now before the Senate was introduced in response to the request of the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the partition between Treasury bonds and Treasury notes within the debt limit of $45,000,000,000, so that orderly financing in the interest of the Government might be followed. The bill before us has nothing in the world to do with the agreement entered into between the power companies in Tennessee and the T. V. A., or with the legislation which is proposed in the form of an amendment to the pending bill.

What would be the situation if the amendment were added to this bill? There has been no change in the public-debt legislation as originally introduced. It was reported out of the Ways and Means Committee without change. It passed the House without amendment and with little opposition. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska should be agreed to, the conferees appointed on the part of the Senate and the conferees appointed on the part of the House to consider revenue legislation would then be called upon to consider the T. V. A. amendment in conference, if the amendment should go to conference. Of course, the Senator from Nebraska says that a motion would be made in the House to concur in the amendment. That may be. No doubt the proponents of the amendment would make such a motion. But suppose the motion did not prevail in the House?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say in answer to that question that, so far as I am concerned, if the motion did not prevail my fight would be ended. If the House had a yea-and-nay vote, and it were messaged back to the Senate that the House had disagreed, I should then be in favor of receding from our amendment. The amendment will never get to conference. I do not see any necessity of its ever going to conference. I want the House to have an opportunity to vote, and I intend to abide by the vote of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] nods his head in assent to the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I feel the same way about it, and so state to the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I must follow up my line of thought, even though I am "unhorsed." I never thought the time would come in legislative matters when the Senator from Nebraska would give up so easily. In his long legislative career I have never known him to surrender so quickly.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, we cannot enact a law without the approval of the House, which would either have to concur in the amendment or reject it. However, the parliamentary tangle is such that the House will not have an opportunity to vote until the time has passed for this particular contract to be approved. If we do not adopt the amendment, the contract will be dead. All I want is to let the House speak; and when the House shall have spoken I know that if the House does not want the legislation we cannot have it, and I will surrender.

Mr. HARRISON. I presume the Senator from Nebraska has reasons which seem sufficient to him for pressing the amendment. Of course, the Senator is adroit, adept, and wise in parliamentary tactics. I was a little surprised when he said that all he wanted was a vote. If the matter is voted down, it may rise again. Of course, I give full faith and credit to what the Senator from Nebraska says.

So far as I am concerned, I would not serve on the conference committee, because I do not know enough about the details of the amendment. If a conference committee were to be appointed to deal with the amendment, the committee ought to come from the membership of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the Senate, which reported the bill, and from the Military Affairs Committee of the House, which handles T. V. A. matters in the House.

Mr. President, I cannot agree to the adoption of the amendment to the pending bill. It has never come before the Finance Committee. We are dealing with a simple bill and not with the complex proposal involved in the amendment. If the amendment should be agreed to, the members of my committee would take umbrage at such action. They would feel-and, I think, justifiably so-that they had not been treated fairly.

I dislike to see this kind of proposed legislation attached to another bill as an amendment. Such measures ought to stand upon their own footing. In the past I have heard many distinguished Senators into whose eyes I now look make that statement upon the floor of the Senate.

I do not care anything about a fight between committees in the House or jealousies between committees in the House. There is great leadership in the House, which has straightened out many tangled situations; and it would seem to me that if this proposal is being smothered in the House Committee on Military Affairs because of the attitude of certain members of that committee, the gentlemen over there who have done so well in the past can untangle the situation and straighten it out so that the House may vote on the measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has served in both the House and the Senate. Will the Senator tell the Senate what the House could do or how the House could take the bill from the committee within the limit of time in which it must be done? It is impossible. There is no way to discharge the committee in the House within the limited time.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that the Senator from Nebraska is well acquainted with the Speaker of the House [Mr. Bank-HEAD] and the leader of the majority [Mr. RAYBURN] as I am. I know how persuasive they are, how influential they are, and how close they are to other Members. I think the leadership in the House might succeed in having the Military Affairs Committee of the House report the bill so that the House could vote upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to my friend from Mississippi that, in my judgment, unless the amendment is adopted there will be no chance for the measure to be passed in time to conform with the preliminary contract which has been made. I appeal to the Senator from Mississippi to allow the amendment to be agreed to by the Senate, and let it go to conference, where it can take the course which has been outlined by the Senator from Nebraska. I hope my friend will do that.

Mr. HARRISON. I am as fond of the Senator from Tennessee as I am of the Senator from Nebraska. If the Senator from Tennessee were chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, which handled the intricate questions touching the T. V. A., and he differed with some other gentlemen with reference to a piece of legislation, and were conducting hearings, and he saw efforts being made in the other body to take jurisdiction away from him, I cannot conceive in my wildest imagination anyone who would raise more "sand" than would the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to answer that question, I will say to him that many years ago I introduced in the House the first Muscle Shoals bill that ever passed. It was reported by the Military Affairs Committee, of which I was a member at the time. It was defeated in the House. The Senator was in the House, and voted for the measure, which was attached to another bill as an amendment. The Senator voted for it, but, through the activity of some gentlemen who were opposed to it, it was defeated. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] introduced the same measure in the Senate. It was adopted by the Senate and went to conference, became the law, and is the law today.

As a Member of the House at that time who had offered the Muscle Shoals Dam amendment, I was delighted that the Senator from South Carolina offered substantially the same amendment in the Senate and had it adopted. I was even more delighted to see the Smith amendment adopted by both Houses. It was a condition, not a theory, which confronted me then; and it is a condition, not a theory, which confronts us today. Surely, as a Member of the House, I was not hurt because the Senator from South Carolina fathered the proposal in the Senate. This is the only way in which we can save the situation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I wish to say only a few words in conclusion, and then I wish to have a vote taken on the amendment.

I have no personal interest in the world in the amendment. Senators who wish to vote for it will vote for it. I shall not serve on the conference committee if it should get that far. The Senator from Nebraska says it will not get that far. He may know what those in charge of legislation in the House are going to do. He may appreciate better than I that everything is fixed, and that the amendment would be carried in the House. However, whatever action the Senate may take on this question will be entirely satisfactory to me. For my part, I will not affront the House by voting to add an amendment dealing with the T. V. A. to a simple bill dealing with the question of removing the partition in public-debt obligations, particularly in view of the fact that the House Military Affairs Committee has now pending before it the Senate bill identical with this amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that if the amendment should be adopted and go to the House, a motion to concur in the Senate amendment would be a preferential motion in the House?

Mr. HARRISON. It would. Mr. CONNALLY. All the mover would have to do would be to obtain recognition from the Chair and move to concur, which would be a preferential motion; and it would be possible, probably, to get a vote on the question of concurring. Of course, if the House refused to concur, that would be the last of it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass]. I learn that he has not voted. I am informed that if present the Senator from Virginia would vote "nay." Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from California [Mr. Johnson] is paired on this question with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Gerry]. The Senator from California, if present, would vote "yea," and I am advised that the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "nay."

I announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Tobey] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Wiley] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh].

All of these Senators are necessarily detained, and I am not advised how any of them would vote, if present.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent because of an operation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] is detained from the Senate because of illness. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "nay."

The Senators from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead and Mr. Hill], the Senator from New York [Mr. Mead], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Minton], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Schwartz], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Smathers] are absent on important public business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton] is detained at his home by a slight illness.

I am advised that if present and voting those Senators would vote "yea."

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Chavez], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Clark], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCarran], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys] are detained in Government departments on official matters.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. Andrews], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Herring], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] are attending important committee meetings.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Balley], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Gerry], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gillette], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas] are absent on important public business.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Burke] is absent on official business for the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] is attending the exercises at the Naval Academy, and is therefore necessarily detained.

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 23, as follows:

	YE	AS-45

So the amendment of Mr. Norris was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] or the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg] to state a little more fully—and I am frank to say it is for the Record—the object of this proposed amendment to the Second Liberty Bond Act. It seems on its face to state a purpose which all of us ought to understand; but what is it intended that the Secretary of the Treasury may do or is going to do under this proposed amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that a year ago, when legislation was enacted fixing the debt limit at $45,000,000,000, the partition then was $25,-000,000,000 of long-term paper or bonds and $20,000,000,000 of short-term paper, Treasury notes, and so forth. In 1938, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, we passed legislation which increased the limitation on bonds to $30,000,000,000, leaving at $15,000,000,000 the amount of short-term notes, Treasury notes, and so forth, that could be issued and maintaining the debt limit at $45,000,000,000.

I can best answer the Senator's inquiry by reading the recommendation of the President. In the last paragraph he says:

I recommend that the Congress take such action as may be necessary to give the Treasury the authority which will enable it to carry out its financing operations during the next fiscal year as may be for the best interest of the Government in line with market conditions at the time of such financing.

And the Secretary of the Treasury stated:

In order that the Treasury may be in a position to take advantage of favorable market conditions and not be forced to confine all of its financing operations to short-term obligations, I strongly urge that a recommendation be made to the Congress that the limitation of $30,000,000,000 on bonds be eliminated entirely so as to give the Treasury the flexibility it needs for its financing operations during the next fiscal year.

I may say further to the Senator that within the $30,000,000,000,000 limitation the Treasury now may issue bonds to the extent of only $1,697,000,000. They may still issue, under the law as it now exists, $5,043,000,000 of additional public-debt obligations. When the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Finance Committee last week, he stated that in the near future he had to refund over $980,000,000 of Treasury notes, and he wanted to do it by issuing Treasury bonds, contending that it was better for the Government to do so. The Secretary stated that he desired to issue securities best suited at the time to meet the conditions of the market and the needs of the Government.

I may say that the question has arisen in the committee, advanced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown], who is not here temporarily, and I think by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally], that if it is now advocated by the administration that a tax on future Government securities be enacted into law, it is somewhat of an inconsistent policy for the Government at this time to want authority to issue additional bonds, which naturally would be tax exempt. But the answer to the question of the Senator from Idaho is that the Treasury expects soon to have to refinance a considerable amount of short-term paper, and from a Government standpoint it would be advantageous to be able to issue Treasury bonds rather than Treasury notes.

Mr. BORAH. This bill does not increase the debt limit?

Mr. HARRISON. It does not. In that connection, I may say that I have not been at all in sympathy with increasing the national debt over the $45,000,000,000 limit now in the law. When I was approached on the question, I vigorously expressed my opposition to any increase at this time in the present limitation; but I can see no objection to removing the partition which exists in the present law. If the Treasury authorities, from a financial standpoint, feel they can issue long-term Government bonds more advantageously to the Government than they can issue short-term paper, I think we ought to give them the authority. That is all this bill does.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield? I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is all I have to say. This bill does not, as I see it, in any way affect the question of tax-exempt securities.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not. I stated what I did merely because the theory was advanced that it was somewhat inconsistent at this time for us to promote the issuance of long-term tax-exempt securities when at the same time we propose to put a tax on future securities. That question is not dealt with in this bill, however.

Mr. BORAH. We have not been very anxious about the taxation of securities so far as the Federal Government is concerned, because twice we have rejected proposals to tax them. It is only when it is a question of taxing State securities which are now exempt that we have manifested great interest in the matter. We have unquestioned power to tax Federal securities, but under the advice of the Treasury we refuse to do so. It is when a doubtful question arises as to taxing State securities that we become deliriously anxious.

Mr. HARRISON. In that connection, I will say to the Senator that, of course, there is a large group of American citizens and a large group of Members of both bodies who believe that when we begin to tax future issues of Federal securities we ought at the same time to tax future issues of securities of States, counties, and so on. In my opinion, the matter should be handled as one proposition. I have been assured by Members of the House that they are going to begin to consider the question at this session, unless the pressure is strong enough to force an adjournment before they can do it.

Mr. BORAH. There is no question now, is there, about the power of the Government to tax Federal securities?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think so.

Mr. BORAH. I not only do not think so but I know so.
Mr. CONNALLY. They are now being taxed. All of them pay surtaxes, except the old 3½-percent wartime bonds.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Mississippi said about the reason for the Treasury's action in asking that this authority be granted, let me ask the Senator from Mississippi if it is not true that the position of the Treasury is that while they get cheaper money right now on short-term Treasury notes than on bonds there is such a large volume of the short-term notes, and they accumulate so rapidly, that the Treasury feels that it would be unwise not to refinance them over a longer period and avoid any danger of the money market rapidly enhancing and catching them with this large volume of obligations that they would have to pay. They might then have to issue long-term bonds at a higher interest rate than they would be able to issue them for now.

Mr. VANDENBERG rose.

Mr. CONNALLY. At the present time the money market is quite low; and the Treasury, I think rather wisely, have concluded that since inevitably they are going to have to refinance the short-term paper with long-term issues, they had better do it now, while the market is low, rather than run the danger of the market enhancing.

I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think the Senator has now stated the precise reason which moves the Treasury, and I think he has correctly stated it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think that was the reason which appealed to the Committee on Finance—that for the moment we are getting cheap money through short-term securities, but that that condition is not apt to continue indefinitely; and the Treasury felt that we had better refinance now, while the market is low, and put the obligations in long-term securities, which would not force the Government to a settlement at some critical period.

Let me say to the Senator from Idaho, regarding the taxability of these bonds, that while of course there is nothing in this bill relating to the subject, some members of the Finance Committee thought it was a rather inconsistent policy for the Federal Government to go ahead and issue all these tax-free bonds of its own, and then enact legislation providing, so far as State bonds are concerned, that future issues would be taxable, but all the great mass of Federal indebtedness that has already been accumulated would be exempt. That is what the Senator from Mississippi had in mind. As a matter of fact, there never has been any reason why the Federal Government should not tax the income from its own securities.

Mr. BORAH. Except that we were not willing to do it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. The Treasury officials do not want to tax these bonds, and they said so in the hearings. I said, "Why not?" They said, "Well, it will cost us more interest. The Government will either have to sell the bonds for less, or we shall have to pay a higher interest rate. Therefore, we do not want to do it now. We are going to do it sometime, but not now."

Mr. BORAH. That is what they said on two different occasions when we had a tax bill before us.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly.

So far as I know, the only securities of the Federal Government which are entirely tax-exempt at the present time, if there be any of them still outstanding, are the old 3½ percent bonds which we issued during the World War. They were free of all tax; but, as I now recall, all other Federal securities are subject to surtax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield— The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator if it is not true that all the 3½-percent bonds of which the Senator speaks have been paid off.

Mr. CONNALLY. It may be that they have been.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure, but that is my impression. Mr. CONNALLY. I am not sure, either. I have not any of them. I wish I had; but I have not any, so I cannot tell the Senator. I rather suspect, however, that all the wartime $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percent bonds have been paid off. Therefore, all the other outstanding bonds are now subject to the surtax, not to the normal tax. In some cases there are exemptions on the interest up to \$5,000 worth of bonds; but they are all subject to some form of surtax, and they are subject, if we want to impose it, to normal tax; but the Treasury has never felt that it is good business to do so.

With regard to the $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percent bonds, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when we had up in the House some years ago a constitutional amendment proposing to tax all Federal and State securities, the Treasury statistics showed that the $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percent bonds, entirely tax-free, were selling above par, and that the $4\frac{1}{3}$'s and the $4\frac{1}{3}$'s and the $4\frac{1}{3}$'s, subject only to the surtax, were all away down below par; and therefore the Treasury felt that if future issues were taxed the Government would have to pay a higher rate of interest or the public would not buy them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me a great deal of insincerity is manifested in connection with the question of taxing Government securities. We have always had the power—no one ever doubted that, I suppose—to tax the securities of the Federal Government; but we have never been willing to do so, except as to surtaxes, because we thought it would cost the Federal Government more to get the money. Now we are making quite a disturbance over a proposal to prepare to tax State securities and all State instrumentalities, and so forth, when we have been unwilling to tax the securities of that sovereignty which has the power to tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with what the Senator has said; but I think it ought to be stated that one reason why we passed a law which permitted, for instance, $5,000 in the hands of any one person to be exempt from all taxation, even the surtax not applying, was with the idea of causing a wider investment and circulation in those bonds among comparatively poor people. We could pass a law, if we taxed the State securities, containing the same exemption, if we desired, if we thought it advisable, and thought it would result in more people of moderate means investing their savings in that way. We could exempt from taxation up to any limit we saw fit, and then tax the balance as we have done.

Mr. BORAH. I am not prepared to challenge the statement of the Senator as to the reason or as to the wisdom of the policy. I am very much in favor of taxing securities, but I am in favor of the Federal Government taxing its securities and of the State government attending to its securities. If that course is followed, no constitutional inhibition will stand in the way of our proceeding to tax these securities. But, while the power to tax goes unused, the power which we do not possess or which it is most doubtful we possess, gives rise to great zeal. If this proposition to tax securities were stripped of its unrealities, we would have little difficulty in doing the wise and just thing.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Senate has a special committee which has studied this subject recently, and, bringing the matter up to date, I wish to say that before that committee representatives of the Government of the United States appeared and admitted, as recently as within 3 months, that the cost to the Government of financing its operations in bonds which are taxed is greater than in the case of bonds which are exempt. So that, as a matter of policy, to say nothing about the principle involved, the Government thus far is not interested in waiving the immunity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Vermont, and also to the Senator from Idaho, that back of this theoretical taxation of both Federal and State securities the chief desire is to tax county and State securities. It had its genesis largely in the days of Mr. Mellon-and I speak respectfully of Mr. Mellon, who was a great financier. But when he was Secretary of the Treasury he advanced and advocated, and testified before the committee in favor of, a constitutional amendment making it possible for the Government to tax both Federal and State securities and permitting the States to tax Federal securities. The theory advanced, not openly but all around the lobbies of the Congress, was that industrialists were opposed to leaving State bonds free of taxation because they competed so successfully with railroad and other industrial securities. They said it was driving money out of productive channels and into unproductive channels and was unfair competition; that if we would put a tax on State, municipal, and county bonds there would be a more nearly equal balance.

Mr. Mellon, who cannot be regarded as having been a radical, was the one who was advancing the theory of grabbing the swollen fortunes which were wrapped up in tax-exempt bonds. He was the chief proponent. He appeared before the committee in the House and his testimony is still on record. As I now recall—I may possibly be in error—he said that if we taxed Federal securities there would be an increase of at least 1 percent in taxes each year. He may have said onehalf of 1 percent-I do not desire to be unfair-but, as I recall, he said that according to his view the increase would be 1 percent a year. At any rate, whether it was one-half or 1 percent a year, it can readily be conceived how much that would amount to on any sizable bond issue running over a period of 15 or 20 or 25 years. There is more desire on the part of the Treasury to tax State bonds than to tax Federal bonds because they do not advocate taxing Federal bonds. They are going to do it some time or other in the future, but what they want to do is to tax State, municipal, and county bonds.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It will be recalled that when the Federal income tax amendment was proposed, it was proposed and urged by many who did not believe in an income tax at all. It was urged because it was thought that if the Supreme Court should modify its opinion, having rendered a 5-to-4 opinion, we would have the power without constitutional amendment to enact an income tax law. It was believed that if a constitutional amendment were submitted and we depended upon a constitutional amendment, it would never, in all probability, be adopted. I know that as a matter of fact, because I participated in the consideration of the matter at that time.

At the present time there are a great many people who are very anxious about this income tax constitutional amendment, knowing full well that we have the power now, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, to do everything we are talking about doing, but which we have never been willing to do. Twice after an amendment had been attached to a tax bill it was killed in conference, and killed under the direction, as I was informed, of those who are now urging a constitutional amendment. I happened to be the author of both these amendments and was fully informed as to why they were defeated in conference.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. I do not know about the details of that, but I seem to recall that the Senator from Idaho offered and secured the adoption in the Senate of an amendment of that character, but that it went out of the bill in conference.

Of course the Federal Government has, and has always had, the power to tax its own securities, and it will continue to have that power. It is just a question of whether it wants to do it or whether it does not. My own view is that, in order to tax State securities we will have to have a constitutional amendment. But the Finance Committee has been investigating that subject; it has not as yet reported, but I understand it probably will report that Congress can do it by statute. I do not think it can, but of what value is a Senator's opinion when the Supreme Court may decide he is wrong?

Mr. AUSTIN. I know there will be a minority report if the majority shall report such a bill. The committee certainly would not agree unanimously that we have the constitutional power to tax the securities issued by States and municipalities.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator; and along that line I desire to say that the recent decision of the Supreme Court upholding the tax on the salaries of State officers does not foreclose the question with respect to the tax of income from bonds, because in the one case the Court held that an incidental tax on a State official's salary was not a burden on the State, but that cannot be said of a tax on a State's own securities, because there would be at least some degree of burden on the activities of a State, if we taxed its securities.

Mr. BORAH. Neither the decision of the Supreme Court with reference to salaries, nor the decision to which the Senator has referred, seems to me to touch the question of whether or not we have the power to tax State securities.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. It is still an open question, for Congress.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was speaking of the taxing of State securities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 5748) was read the third time and passed.

NECESSITY OF GOVERNMENT AID IN FURNISHING FOOD

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, no one is going to starve in this country, according to many usually well-informed Senators who have spoken from time to time on this floor. So far as I can recall, on every occasion when someone has suggested that reduction in relief expenses is causing or would cause actual starvation in many families throughout the country, the statement has been challenged, and some Senator would rise and say, "Show me an instance where anyone is actually in want of food."

This Government has done a great deal for those whom the President has designated as "ill fed, ill housed, and ill clothed," but the Federal and State Governments are not doing enough when such conditions can exist as do now exist in my own State, which is doing as much as many other States in its expenditures for relief in proportion to population.

Recently I saw in the Spokane (Wash.) Chronicle a statement quoting Dr. A. E. Lien, county physician, as saying:

We have a large number of people unable to work and afflicted with diseases that require adequate food. I feel I am throwing away costly medicine given these people because I know they do not have enough to eat. Today I had to hospitalize a 2-year-old baby sick from insufficient food. It had only bread and water to eat for the past 5 days, and although the father had resided here a year and a half he could get no relief.

Not wanting to rely entirely on the newspaper quotation, although I felt that it was correct, I wrote to Dr. Lien as I noted a clipping in the Spokane Chronicle in which you were quoted as stating that you had to hospitalize a 2-year-old baby because it was sick from lack of food. This is a most tragic situation.

I would appreciate it if you would give me the particulars about this and any similar cases that you have encountered so that I can present this data to the Governor of the State as well as to the Congress.

Dr. Lien's reply verified the newspaper statement that for a week a 2-year-old baby had had nothing but bread and water to eat. Its parents, according to Dr. Lien, were unable either to obtain relief or to obtain W. P. A. work. The father was classified as employable and therefore not eligible for direct relief, and at the same time the W. P. A. could not employ him because the quota of jobs for the State would not allow it.

I am going to submit Dr. Lien's letter for the RECORD. In passing. I wish to note that in his letter he mentions the case of a young expectant mother who developed a kidney infection due to lack of food and inadequate housing and is now being hospitalized by the county. As Dr. Lien says, it is more expensive to give hospitalization than to provide adequate food for the poor.

I particularly want to call attention to this statement from Dr. Lien's letter:

I have two full-time physician assistants who make most of the visits to the homes of these sick people, and they are reporting to me daily that they are encountering more and more people who have either nothing to eat or just some beans, cornmeal, bread, and water. This is not a fantastic statement, because these doctors time and again make it a special point to look into the kitchen

The county health officer of Spokane County is not criticizing anyone. He is merely giving me the information for which I asked in my letter, and he has the same viewpoint that so many other doctors have and which was recently voiced by Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General, United States Public Health Service, that undernourishment is endangering the health of great numbers of our citizens. I feel sure that inquiries directed to county health officers in other counties in my State would reveal situations similar to that in Spokane County, and that there is nothing exceptional about the needs of the people who live there as compared with the need of those who live in other places in my State and in other States.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Seattle Star of April 27, 1939, showing a picture of a woman in a hospital bed, with the heading, "Example of 'Let 'Em Starve' Policy." I have no official information about this particular case, but the author of the article, Mr. Jack Heise, states that this family was "thrown out of their house and camped beside the road without shelter or food. The relief agencies refused to come to their aid." I want to quote a small portion of this article:

Neighbors brought them a little food and after a time they found shelter in a two-room shack without lights, water, or fuel.

Rain dripped through the roof. They walked four blocks for water. Chips and sticks were gathered by the children, all under 11 years old, to build a little fire in a pit in front of the shack.

Then, from lack of food and exposure, Mrs. Currier was rushed to King County Hospital. Two of the other youngsters are sick and may have to be taken to the hospital right away.

King County Hospital it cost $4.02 a day to keep Mrs. Currier.

The cost to date is $12.06 for Mrs. Currier, and it will be another week or so before she is able to leave. If the two children have to be taken to the hospital today, the cost will rise to $12.06 a day for the Currier family.

They haven't been able to figure out yet that $4.02 a day in the hospital costs more than $1 for food.

Not all of our citizens are as meek and willing to suffer as Mr. Currier. I have here a clipping from the Longview News of April 24, headed, "Man uses club on 11 store windows. Ex-W. P. A. worker arrested after noon outbreak. Five firms suffer as Chester Georgia, 27, Woodland, makes bid to get free meals." The explanation of this headline is contained in the statement in the newspaper article by Chester Georgia, the man who committed this crime, that his motive was his need for food and lodging "which he indicated he expects to obtain in prison for some time to come." The article states further:

Georgia told officers that he had been at relief headquarters just before starting his window-smashing tour and had been told that he was not eligible for further direct relief.

Georgia said he came to the county in 1937 from Oklahoma and worked at Castle Rock. Later he went to Woodland.

worked at Castle Rock. Later he went to Woodland.

A check with welfare headquarters revealed that Georgia had been employed on W. P. A. last fall. In December he was dropped when reductions which affected single men went into effect. In January Georgia was hospitalized for pneumonia and after his release obtained some funds from unemployment compensation. He also obtained some direct relief, the last being a small check carly in April. early in April.
On March 17 Myron Mehl, county welfare administrator, said his records show that Georgia warned him that if he did not get relief help within a few days that he would do something which would get him into the penitentiary.

On his way to jail today Georgia told Chief Mullen, "I guess I'll get something to eat for quite a while now.'

I am not condoning Mr. Georgia's action, yet I can sympathize with a man who can find no way to eat regularly except to commit some crime that will result in his going to jail. Is the country going to save money by forcing men to go to prison in order to obtain food? Will not the cost be far greater than providing work through such an agency as the W. P. A.?

I know many Members of the Senate doubt that suffering is being caused by the failure of the Congress to appropriate sufficient money. I feel that the time is coming when they will no longer be skeptical. People who are hungry sooner or later make their want of food felt in a definite way.

Is there hope for the jobless and the hungry? Let Senators judge for themselves whether they may have hope when they read this in the Seattle Star of April 26:

The relief troubles in King County approached a new head today as the State social-security board revealed that it has no intentions of changing the welfare budget for May, and that the present policy of not caring for employable jobless will continue. The county's population of employables—so-called because of their physical ability to work, but unable to find jobs—amounts to about 5,000. During April the employables received 20 cents per day for single men and slightly more than 9 cents per day for members of a family with the money coming from a $38,000 emergency grant by the county. gency grant by the county.

They read further in this story in the Star:

Meanwhile, the jobless themselves are undetermined as to what course of action they should follow. Spokesmen for the group said that the emergency warrants issued for April are practically exhausted, and that no meal tickets are available at the temporary shelter the State has provided at 1181/2 Third Avenue S.

In my hand I hold another page from the Seattle Star, the issue of April 25, which was sent to me by a constituent who did not sign his name. He did not need to. The paper speaks for itself. There is here a picture of a mother, Mrs. Esther Heagy, and her new-born son. I would like to quote a portion of the accompanying article, and let the Members of the Senate draw their own conclusions as to whether this Nation is going to be strengthened by treating mothers and children of America as this mother and child have been treated:

A young mother cuddled her 4-day-old baby in her arms yesterday and cooed to it. For a while the worried frown that has creased her brow was gone. She had thoughts only for her new-born child.

But as soon as the baby was gone, the worried, harrowed look came back to the eyes of Mrs. Esther Heagy, for she has been try-ing to find a way to keep her child in the one-room cabin at 10036

Interlake Avenue, where she and her husband live.

With only $2.60 a week on relief, they haven't been able to save much toward buying the baby clothes and blankets, although the husband fixed up a tiny crib.

"Ralph has been so worried," she said of her 18-year-old hus-band. "He wants to work and get nice things for the baby and me, but he just hasn't been able to find a job. I feel more sorry for him than for myself and Gale—that's what I'm calling the baby—because he is so discouraged."

How would Senators like to live on $2.60 a week? And why should we not? Are we made of any different clay than others? And is it not due only to fortuitous circumstances that we are here instead of being under the necessity of getting along on $2.60 a week, or perhaps nothing a week?

These isolated instances are supported by statistics which go to show that these heartbreaking conditions are prevalent throughout the country. My own beautiful State is no exception.

I feel sure that someone is going to raise the question: "Why does not Washington State feed its people?" and leave the implication that my State perhaps is not doing as much as some other States. The fact is that it is doing far more than most States are doing. A chart prepared by the Division of Public Assistance Research of the Social Security Board shows that in 1938 my State was fifth among all States in the amount of money it raised per inhabitant for payment to the aged. The only States which paid more than Washington were Colorado, California, Utah, and Nevada. chart shows that my State is among the leaders in the amount raised per inhabitant for aid to the blind and for aid to dependent children, and is more generous with direct relief than many other States.

The latest report of the Social Security Board, which is for February of this year, shows that in the old-age assistance classification my State has a larger number of recipients per 1,000 estimated population 65 years of age and older than 36 other States and it pays more per month, our average per recipient being $22.13, than do 39 other States. Certainly $22.13 is far from enough for aged persons to live on for a month, and yet most States pay less than that and some less

In the program for aid to dependent children the average amount paid per family throughout the United States in February 1939 was $32.51, and in my State it was $29.28, and that is more than is paid in 14 other States. My State has more recipients of aid to dependent children per 1,000 of population than 31 other States.

While my State is not at the top of the list in its relief expenditures per case, it is far from the bottom, although it is not a rich State. It appears that Senators from some States can very well rise to say that Washington should provide more money, and I hope we will, although I find that many people in my State, just as in other States, are clamoring for more economy. But when economy means hunger, cold, tattered clothing, undernourished babies, and hopeless degradation, it is a challenge to our civilization.

I ask that Dr. Lien's letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH OF SPOKANE COUNTY, SPOKANE COUNTY COURT HOUSE, Spokane, Wash., May 12, 1939.

HOD HOMER T. BONE

Hon. Homer 1. Bone, United States Senate, Washington, D. C. Dear Senator: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated May 2, 1939, and shall try to give you a picture of the relief situation here as it affects my office.

In the case of the 2-year-old baby about whom you read, it was a fact that the only food this child had had for a week was bread and water. The father had originally come into this county as a transient, but at the time the baby came to my attention the father had lived here about a year and a half. For reasons not determinable by me he was unable to get either relief or work from W. P. A., and in April he and his family came into that group that were completely cut off relief because he was employable. As soon as the baby's condition became known to me I authorized hospitalization for it, because that was the only way in which I could find proper food for it. However, at the same time others became interested, and since it was a matter of feeding and not actual illness, the child was not actually hospitalized. It is my understanding that this situation, so far as this family is concerned, has been adequately taken care of.

If as this family is concerned, has been adequately taken care of.

I have on my hands now another situation that is almost as bad, namely, a young woman who is about 6 months pregnant, who with her husband and other children had been evicted from their place of residence because of nonpayment of rent. This family had been on relief and were unable to pay rent. About 3 weeks ago the husband was given work on W. P. A. and simultaneously removed from direct relief assistance. The eviction came at the same time. He had not rener assistance. The eviction came at the same time. He had not had enough time on W. P. A. to draw any pay, so he was not paying either food or rent. The result was that his wife, through lack of food and proper housing, became ill with a kidney infection, which added to her burden of pregnancy. I have had her in the Sacred Heart Hospital now for about 2 weeks, with only slow improvement in her health.

In connection with my work as Spokane County physician, it is my duty to take care of medical, surgical, and hospital relief for all residing in this county, who are unable to pay for the same. This is regardless of whether or not they are on any other kind of relief—W. P. A. or other low-wage-earning jobs. I have two full-time physician assistants who make most of the visits to the homes of these sick people, and they are reporting to me daily that they are encountering more and more people who have either nothing to eat or just some beans, corn meal, bread, and water. This is not a fantastic statement because these doctors time and time again make it a special point to look into the kitchen cupboards. You may not know it but today in this county a single person on direct relief gets $5 per month for food. For additional members of the family, $2 per head is added with a total maximum being $12 per month for food. In my opinion it does not require a great stretch of the imagination to realize that such amounts are entirely inadequate. Such a situation, if continued long, of course can mean only one thing and that is sickness, and it costs a great deal more to care for people who are sick than to feed them prop-deal more to care for people who are sick than to feed them properly so as to prevent illness.

Another of our serious problems is the lack of adequate amount of milk for the children who come to our attention. On April 24 I had my nutritionist make a survey of the daily needs of those children who are on various forms of relief including W. P. A., and she estimated and reported to me that there was a need of approximately 2,200 quarts of milk per day. This amount of milk is needed in excess of whatever other milk and food relief may already be given. This report was based on the relief rolls as of March 1, 1939.

March 1, 1939.

These conditions as outlined to you have been reported to the Spokane board of county commissioners and to the Spokane County advisory committee as well as Mr. Robert McCann, administrator of the Spokane county welfare department. All of these agencies are very much interested and are trying to relieve the situation as best they can, but adequate funds are simply not available. Since April 24 when I reported on the milk need, Mr. McCann has for the time being, issued orders for additional milk for the amount of $615 per month. However, this $615 per month is a mere drop in the bucket when it comes to supplying an adequate amount of milk for the children. I am enclosing a survey made May 8, 1939, by my nutritionist which is a child census pertaining to various types of relief in the county and city of Spokane. You will note the footnote on page 2, Mr. McCann is stating that the fund now available does not cover adequate milk supplies taining to various types of the control of the cont least $1,000 per month.

I wish to impress upon you that in presenting these facts, I am I wish to impress upon you that in presenting these facts, I am not in any way attempting to criticize any person or any political group that is responsible for the administration of the public welfare. My only interest is to obtain proper and adequate food supplies for these poor people and I trust you will accept these remarks in the same light.

There is one other matter that has been brought to my attention There is one other matter that has been brought to my attention recently and about which I frankly admit I know little. I have been told that the W. P. A. rolls and money being spent on W. P. A. projects in this county now are only about half of that being spent in Pierce County. If this is true and if it would be possible to lift the W. P. A. money in this county to the level of that said to be spent in Pierce County, our burden would be greatly eased.

I wish to thank you very much for your letter and I hope that my remarks may be of value to you in assisting you in obtaining better care for these people in Spokane County.

I beg to remain,

I beg to remain, Yours very truly,

ARTHUR E. LIEN, M. D., County Physician.

ACQUISITION OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. THOMAS of Utah submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 572) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amend-

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That the natural resources of the United States in certain strategic and critical materials being deficient or insufficiently developed to supply the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country for common defense, it is the policy of Congress and the purpose and intent of this Act to provide for the acquisition of stocks of these materials and to encourage the development of mines and deposits of these materials within the United States, and thereby decrease and prevent wherever possible a dangerous and purpose and intent of this Act to provide for the acquisition of stocks of these materials and to encourage the development of mines and deposits of these materials within the United States, and thereby decrease and prevent wherever possible a dangerous and costly dependence of the United States upon foreign nations and costly dependence of the United States upon foreign nations for supplies of these materials in times of national emergency.

"Sec. 2. To effectuate the policy set forth in section 1 hereof the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior, acting jointly through the agency of the Army and Navy Munitions Board, are hereby authorized and directed to determine which materials are strategic and critical under the provisions of this Act and to determine the quality and quantities of such materials which shall be purchased within the amount of the appropriations authorized by this Act. In determining the materials which are strategic and critical and the quality and quantities of same to be purchased the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Commerce shall each designate representatives to cooperate with the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this Act.

"Sec. 3. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, when they deem such action appropriate because the domestic production or supply of any of the above materials is insufficient to meet the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country, shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury, through the medium of the Procurement Division of his Department and from the funds authorized by the provisions of this Act, to make purchases of such materials in accordance with specifications prepared by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department and approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and to provide for the storage and maintenance, and, where necessary to prevent deterioration, for the rotation of such materials on military and naval reservations or in other locations approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

"Sec. 4. Materials acquired under this Act except for rotation to prevent deterioration shall be used only upon the order of the President in time of war, or when he shall find that a national emergency exists with respect to national defense as a consequence of the threat of war.

"Sec. 5 Purchases under this Act shall be made in accordance."

"SEC. 5. Purchases under this Act shall be made in accordance with Title III of the Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520), but a reasonable time (not to exceed one year) shall be allowed for production and delivery from domestic sources and in the case of any such material available in the United States but which has not any such material available in the United States but which has not been developed commercially, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may, if they find that the production of such material is economically feasible, direct the purchase of such material without requiring the vendor to give bond.

"SEC. 6. For the procurement, transportation, maintenance, rotation, and storage of the materials to be acquired under this Act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, during the fiscal years June 30, 1939, to and including June 30, 1943, to be expended under the joint direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

"SEC. 7. (a) That the Secretary of the Interior, through the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the Director of the Geological Survey, is hereby authorized and directed to make scientific, technologic, and economic investigations concerning the extent amode of occurrence, the development, mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances found in ment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances found in the United States or its Territories or insular possessions, which are essential to the common defense or the industrial needs of the United States, and the quantities or grades of which are inadequate from known domestic sources, in order to determine and develop domestic sources of supply, to devise new methods for the treatment and utilization of lower grade reserves, and to develop substitutes for such essential ores and mineral products; to explore and develop, on public lands and on privately owned lands, with the consent of the owner, deposits of such minerals, including core drilling, trenching, test-pitting, shaft sinking, drifting, crosscutting, sampling, and metallurgical investigations and tests as may be necessary to determine the extent and quality of such deposits, the most suitable methods of mining and beneficiating them, and the cost at which the minerals or metals may be produced.

"(b) For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1943, the sum of $500,000, of which amount $350,000 shall be appropriated to the Bureau of Mines and $150,000 to the Geological Survey."

And the House agree to the same.

ELBERT D. THOMAS. ED. C. JOHNSON, H. H. SCHWARTZ, WARREN R. AUSTIN, CHAN GURNEY Managers on the part of the Senate.
A. J. May,
EWING THOMASON,
CHAS. I. FADDIS, CHARLES R. CLASON, THOS. E. MARTIN, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah obtained the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. My recollection is that there was a contest in the Senate over the amount to be authorized for the purchase of strategic materials, and that the Senate voted to fix the amount at $40,000,000, as against $100,000,000, the figure that was submitted to it. I ask the Senator what the situation is as presented by the conference report?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senate committee bill, as the Senator will remember, provided an authorization for the expenditure of $25,000,000 a year for 4 consecutive years. The total was $100,000,000. The House bill carried $100,000,000, but without the provision that the time of expenditure be divided up into 4 different periods, as the Senate bill provided. The House amount was accepted by the conferees, and the measure now provides that during the 4 years $100,-000,000 may be expended; but it will be spent not within the period of a given year, or 2 years, or 3 years, but whenever the Appropriation Committees shall see fit to allow the amounts which may be requested.

Mr. ADAMS. My recollection is in error, then, that the Senate fixed the amount at $40,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. No; the Senator's recollection is perfectly correct. The Senate fixed the outside amount at $40,000,000, and provided that $10,000,000 could be expended in each of the 4 years.

Mr. ADAMS. So the Senate conferees have practically accepted the House plan in its entirety?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Practically; yes. There was one change made.

Mr. ADAMS. That is in respect to appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. That is, the House provided for the $100,-000,000 to be available at any time?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. And the Senate had fixed $40,000,000, to be available at the rate of $10,000,000 per annum?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. So the Senate did not fare very well in the conference?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senate did not fare very well in this particular, but in all other particulars the Senate did fare very well.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield gladly.

Mr. GEORGE. What did the conferees do with the provision with respect to the reserve officers called back to active duty? Is that item now contained in the measure?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think not.

Mr. GEORGE. I had the impression that it was contained in the measure before us.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think that item comes up in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the conference

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I was unable to hear the colloquy between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. Thomas]. I recall that when the bill was before the Senate, after considerable debate and study the amount was reduced from $100,000,000 to $40,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. What was the attitude of the conferees regarding that item?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senate conferees stood by the Senate amendment, and lost.

Mr. McNARY. If I correctly interpret the Senator's remarks, the conferees on the part of the Senate tried to follow the instructions of the Senate to have the amount fixed at $40,000,000, but yielded to the House and agreed to fix the amount at $100,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. Then I assume the fight was not a very strengous one.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Perhaps I had better leave it to my associates among the conferees on the part of the Senate to answer the question. So far as I was concerned, it was not a strenuous fight.

Mr. McNARY. Really, I am anxious to know about it. The conferees, of course, as the Senator so well knows, must carry out the declaration of the Senate irrespective of their own personal views. I am curious to know if they regarded highly the Senate vote reducing the amount from $100,000,000 to $40,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I may say that the conferees regarded their task very seriously; debated the question for a long time; supported the Senate stand, and finally lost.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I may ask what provision is made for the expenditure of the $100,000,000 over a period of years.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The measure, as it stands in the conference report, provides for the authorization of $100,-000,000. The bill originally presented to the Senate authorized $100,000,000 to be spent at the rate of $25,000,000 a year for 4 years. The House bill carried a provision calling for $100,000,000, but to be spent as the administration recommended and as Congress approved during the 4-year period, in amounts which the Appropriations Committees and the Congress deemed advisable. The Senate committee bill and the House bill carried identical amounts of $100,000,000 before the Senate bill was amended, but the theories of authorization of appropriation were quite different. The original Senate bill provided for an expenditure of $25,000,000 in each of the 4 years. So it will be found that there is quite a degree of compromise in the conference report, if one studies that element of difference in the two bills.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Gladly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let me say that I sat in that conference for 2 or 3 days, and that I made all the effort I thought was reasonable to retain the limitation of $40,000,000, although I was ready to yield earlier than we finally did yield on the question of the time in which the $40,000,000 could be used. It appeared to me from the debate in the conference that the arbitrary restricting the use of the money to four annual periods, at the rate of $10,000,000 for each period was unwise. So, fairly early in our debate I came to the conclusion that it would be better to adopt the House theory as to the use of the funds, in order that they could be used more flexibly than the Senate had provided. But I adhered as long as I thought was reasonable to do so to the $40,000,000 limitation.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah vield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah.

Mr. TAFT. Do I understand that the Senator from Vermont thinks that the acceptance of $100,000,000 instead of $40,000,000 is made sweeter by the fact that it can all be spent the day after the appropriation is made, instead of having to be spread over 4 years?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the question is not quite so simple as that. The reason for changing from annual limitations was the character of the project, the acquisition of stock piles, and the development of the ability to produce in our own country these commodities so that they would no longer be strategic or critical materials in the United States. Presumably one of the chief objects of this legislation is to relieve the United States of dependence upon foreign sources for such materials. And, if there is any value at all in that element of the bill, then the removal of this limitation was quite as important as anything in the bill. One cannot, simply by inference from the amount finally settled upon, come to the conclusion apparently arrived at by the Senator from Ohio.

So far as I was concerned, I stuck by the amendment adopted by the Senate as long as I thought it was still feasible to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Usually, of course, when a conference is had the Senate gets something out of the conference.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, as I understand the result of our conference, the Senate got the Senate bill practically as it came to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but not as modified by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. No. I have not counted up the concessions. Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The bill as it stands now, as reported by the conferees, is virtually and practically the bill as it passed the Senate, with the exception of the amount.

Mr. McNARY. The amount was the heart of the whole measure

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I disagree entirely with what the Senator from Oregon says. One of the amendments added to the bill by the House of Representatives was discussed here for a whole day and voted down by the Senate. I think that the spirit and theory of the bill passed by the Senate are in many respects quite different from the spirit and theory of the bill passed by the House.

In regard to the amount of money, the Senator, I think, should remember the way in which the amendment was brought into the Senate, the way in which the amendment was adopted, and the statements which were made by the Senator from Utah after the vote was taken, calling attention to the fact that over one-third of the Senators were absent when the amendment was adopted; that the Senator from Utah would not move for a reconsideration, however, in spite of that fact, because the Senator realized that there existed a difference between the Senate bill and the House bill, and that the question would go to conference. Every notice that the Senate should have the Senate did have, and everyone understood that every effort possible would be made for consideration of this matter.

As the Senator from Vermont has said, when it came to the amount the conferees found themselves up against a stone wall.

Mr. McNARY. Before the Senate conferees yielded, did they ask the House conferees to report a disagreement, so that we might vote upon the matter in the Senate?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. We did not do that.

Mr. McNARY. It is very common practice, and I think a prudent one and proper one, when there is very great disagreement and the House conferees are obstinate, or even stubborn, and will not yield to the pleadings of the Senate conferees, to bring the matter back to the Senate for further consideration. I think that is what the Senate conferees should have done in this case.

I wish the Senator would let the matter go over until we have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I see no advantage in letting it go over. Of course, as chairman of the conferees, I should have been happy to take the route suggested by the leader on the other side. However, if he had been present in the conference, he would have realized that that which he has now suggested would have been a vain gesture. We probably did the right thing, and what I think the majority of the Senate wanted us to do.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Utah that, from my point of view, being one of the conferees representing the minority, I should very much like to have the request of the leader of the minority acceded to without delay. Let the report go over. I shall make no effort to persuade anyone that we did the best we could. However, I should like to take this apparent criticism with such grace as I may be possessed of. I should prefer to let the matter go over because of the suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I have no objection to having the report go over if the Senator from Oregon makes the request in that way.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask only that it go over for the day.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is perfectly agreeable to me. Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there is no emergency about the adoption of the conference report today. In my judgment, a delay of a day or two will not change the final result. In view of the fact that we are anxious to bring up an appropriation bill and pass it, if possible, and adjourn until Monday, I suggest that the Senator let the matter go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the conference report will be temporarily passed over.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CIVIL FUNCTIONS OF WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6260, the War Department civil functions appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6260) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be the order.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill covers numerous items under the jurisdiction of the War Department. It covers the Quartermaster Corps, the Signal Corps, the Bureau of Insular Affairs, the Corps of Engineers, the United States soldiers' homes, and the Panama Canal.

The Senate committee, after consideration of the provisions of the House bill, made two amendments. The first amendment is to the item under the heading "Bureau of Insular Affairs; United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands." The Secretary of War asked the Senate committee to recommend that the item for that purpose be increased $4,470 to take care of four additional employees. That was the only request the Secretary of War submitted; and the Senate committee, of course, acceded to that recommendation, and makes the request that the amendment be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the committee amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Bureau of Insular Affairs, United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands," on page 5, line 13, before the word "of", to strike out "$163,130" and insert "$167,600", so as to read:

For the maintenance of the office of the United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands as authorized by subsection 4 of section 7 of the act approved March 24, 1934 (48 Stat. 456), including salaries and wages; rental, furnishings, equipment, maintenance, renovation, and repair of office quarters and living quarters for the High Commissioner; supplies and equipment; purchase and exchange of lawbooks and books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers; traveling expenses, including for persons appointed hereunder within the United States and their families, actual expenses of travel and transportation of household effects from their homes in the United States to the Philippine Islands, and return, utilizing Government vessels whenever practicable; operation, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles, and all other necessary expenses, $167,600, of which amount not exceeding $10,000 shall be available for expenditure in the discretion of the High Commissioner for maintenance of his household and such other purposes as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Corps of Engineers, Rivers and Harbors," on page 7, line 16, after the word "law", to strike out "$96,000,000" and insert "$71,000,000", so as to read:

For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation; for survey of northern and northwestern lakes and other boundary and connecting waters as heretofore authorized, including the preparation, correction, printing, and issuing of charts and bulletins and the investigation of lake levels; for prevention of obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City; for expenses of the California Débris Commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act approved March 1, 1893, as amended (33 U. S. C. 661, 678, 683); for removing sunken vessels or craft obstructing or endangering navigation as authorized by law; for operating and maintaining, keeping in repair, and continuing in use without interruption any lock, canal (except the Panama Canal), canalized river, or other public works for the use and benefit of navigation belonging to the United States, including maintenance of the Hennepin Canal in Illinois; for payment annually of tuition fees of not to exceed 50 student officers of the Corps of Engineers at civil technical institutions under the provisions of section 127a of the National Defense Act, as amended (10 U. Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the next amendment probably will occasion some discussion, although I hope not a lengthy one. This amendment pertains to the amount of money to be appropriated to carry on the work of river and harbor improvements and for flood control.

The House of Representatives sent to us a bill carrying certain sums for river and harbor improvement and for flood control. The Senate committee voted to eliminate $50,000,000 from these two items, $25,000,000 from flood control and $25,000,000 from river and harbor appropriations.

I am advised that the Board of Engineers requested the Bureau of the Budget to approve a very large sum for river and harbor improvements, and a very large sum for flood-control purposes. If I remember correctly, the request was for $103,000,000 for river and harbor improvements and $195,000,000 for the purpose of flood control. The Bureau of the Budget did not accede to that request. The Bureau of the Budget cut down to $30,000,000 the amount allocated for river and harbor improvements, for new construction. In other words, it cut out 70 percent of the amount asked for; and the bill, as reported to the House under the Budget authority, carried only 29 percent of the amount which the Board of Engineers reported it needed and could spend efficiently.

The authorities represented by the Chief of Engineers recommended that $195,000,000 be appropriated for flood control. The Bureau of the Budget, acting upon that request, reduced the amount to $110,000,000. In other words, it cut that item approximately 50 percent.

I think there is no other bureau of the Government with respect to which the Bureau of the Budget reduced the appropriation in such large degree. So the estimates going before the Congress were for $30,000,000, as I remember, for new construction in rivers and harbors and $110,000,000 for new construction for flood-control purposes. The House saw fit, in its deliberations upon the bill, to raise those two items a total of $50,000,000, adding $25,000,000 for river and harbor improvement, making $55,000,000 in all, and adding $25,000,000 to flood control, making $133,000,000 in all. That is the form in which the bill came to the Senate.

The Senate subcommittee held hearings upon the matter; and the full committee, by practically a tie vote—although, of course, there was a majority on the winning side—voted to reduce the amount to the Budget estimate, and cut $50,000,000 from the bill, $25,000,000 from river and harbor improvements, reducing that appropriation to $30,000,000, and $25,000,000 from flood control, reducing that item to

I was directed by the committee to report the bill as amended to the Senate. However, upon my authority as a Senator and not as chairman of the subcommittee, I am opposed to the reductions made by the Senate committee. To simplify the matter, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider these two amendments as one. If we do not, we shall have to vote on three amendments. If we consider them all as one, then the $50,000,000 item becomes involved—a $25,000,000 increase for rivers and harbors and a $25,000,000 increase for flood control. Otherwise we shall have to go to the bill and find out what the particular items are and vote on three amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I think these amendments should be considered at one time as a matter of discussion. However, I question whether they should all be voted upon at one time, as they present somewhat different issues. One of the amendments has to do with rivers and harbors, one has to do specifically with the Mississippi River, and one has to do with flood control. I hope the Senator will not insist upon his request at this time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if there should be objection, of course I could not insist, because any Member has the right to demand a separation.

So under the order the first question would come on the amendment to the river and harbor provision. If we disagree to the Senate amendment, our action would have the force and effect of increasing to $55,000,000 the $30,000,000 appropriated for new construction.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Can the Senator tell us whether or not the proposed appropriation represents all the money that will be used for these purposes? Is there any money in any of the appropriation bills for other departments, appropriated or to be appropriated, which might be used for these purposes?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am advised that to date no other money has been made available for these particular purposes. Of course, when the relief bill comes along, it may be possible for the Congress to earmark some of the relief money for these purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I had a statement which I intended to make in connection with these three amendments. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Thomas] has explained how this appropriation went into the House and how it came away from the House. The House Appropriations Committee did not include the $50,000,000 involved here when it reported the bill to the House, but on the floor of the House the $50,000,000 was added, and it came to the Senate, but the Senate committee has eliminated it.

What the Senator says about the request of the engineers is true. The amount carried in the House bill as it was reported to the House was $71,000,000, the figure which has been restored by the Senate committee, in lieu of $96,000,-000 which the House bill carried as it was finally passed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The $71,000,000 item includes $41,000,000 for maintenance and $30,000,000 for new construction.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct; that is the total for rivers and harbors. However, the bill as reported to the House contained $110,000,000 for flood control and $37,000,000 for the Mississippi River, instead of $39,000,000 which the House finally put in the bill.

I desire to be frank with the Senate about this appropriation. Yesterday in talking with the President about this increase put in the bill on the floor of the House and its elimination by the Senate committee, the President stated that he intended to allocate from relief funds $50,000,000 for river and harbor and flood-control work. I was not certain that I had authority to quote him and to state that he intended to do that, but today I have communicated with him again, and am authorized by him to state that he intends to allocate $50,000,000 from relief funds for use on rivers and harbors and flood-control work, just as this $50,000,000 would be used.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then, if that be true, if $50,-000,000 is to be allocated from relief funds, would not that serve exactly the same purpose? And, if we authorize that amount in this bill, we could reduce the relief appropriation by an equivalent sum. Is not that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, it is possible that could be done, but the President has asked for a definite amount of money for the relief appropriation, amounting altogether to one billion seven hundred and some odd million dollars. I assume that the Committee on Appropriations of the House, the House itself, the committee of the Senate, and the Senate itself, in voting on that amount as a total, when it is brought in, will not consider whether $50,000,000 is to be allocated to one purpose or another, and the inclusion of the $50,000,000 in the bill before the Senate would not necessarily result in the reduction of the relief appropriation by the same amount.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It ought to.

Mr. BARKLEY. But it is desirable I will say, from the standpoint of the executive department, that this additional work for rivers and harbors and flood control be provided for in the relief-appropriation bill, and the President is going to allocate it for that purpose. I felt that I ought to make that statement to the Senate, and to say that the President desires it be known by the Senate that that is what he intends to do.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. As one interested in flood control and river and harbor work, I think the Senate should bear in mind our experience in operating with relief funds. I commend the President for his desire to direct the expenditure of relief funds along useful lines, but I may call the attention of the Senate to the fact that all contracts that are executed or supervised by the Chief of the Army Engineers carry a provision for the utilization of relief labor where such labor is available and may be used.

In 1938 there was an allocation of $30,000,000 from relief funds for work on the lower Mississippi. We were able to use of that sum $7,200,000. I may be in error as to a small amount, but that was approximately what we were able to use, for the reason—and if Senators will stop to think, they will realize the validity of the reason—that in the passage of a relief bill we provide that so much of the money must be expended for labor and so much for materials, and we make other restrictions and requirements. That is the only objection I have to the Senate considering reducing this appropriation upon the expectation of receiving $50,000,000 from relief funds.

It is true that some part of the $50,000,000 from relief funds could be used, for there are certain projects, for instance, projects involving merely the building of levees, that can very easily use relief money, but on many projects relief money cannot be used because of the requirements.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to add a word to what the Senator from Arkansas said as an illustration of what he has said? Of course, when relief funds are turned over to the War Department or to any other department for doing this character of work, the money has to be expended according to relief regulations and relief standards. I happen to have had fall under my observation one case of money being allocated to the War Department for the purpose of doing a lot of clearing in connection with a dam across the Mississippi River near Alton, Ill. A part of that work was on the Missouri side, and the other part was on the Illinois side. The work was precisely of the same character on both sides; there was not any difference in the character of the work on the two sides of the river; but the relief administration arbitrarily set up one wage on the Missouri side of the river and a 35-percent higher wage on the Illinois side of the river, which brought about a labor condition on the Missouri side of the river producing a strike, with the result that they could not expend the relief funds, and the War Department was unable to do the work at all, finally turning the river on the territory to be submerged without even clearing the timber from it at all, simply because the restriction on relief expenditures made it imposible for the War Department to expend the money for the purposes for which it had been allocated.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me for the purpose of making a correction in the figure that I gave the Senate awhile ago?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I said that $30,000,000 was allocated in 1938, which is true, to the general flood-control work; and out of that $30,000,000 the Army was able to spend $19,000,000. Then twenty-two and a half million dollars was allocated to flood-control work on the Mississippi, and they were only able to expend approximately seven and a half million dollars of the twenty-two and a half million dollars. I merely wanted to place the correct figures in the Record. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate what the Senator has said about some of the difficulties probably growing out of the restriction requiring the use of $7 per month per man on relief labor for materials. Of course, that does not interfere with levee work, because it is nearly all man work, anyway, and most of the flood-control projects, I think, involve mostly man work, although there is some machinery used. I think, however, practically all the flood-control work could be accomplished under the allocation made from relief funds, even subject to the restrictions, but, of course, the relief funds that will be available for next year will be subject to whatever provisions the Congress may see fit to enact with respect to the expenditure of those funds, and that appropriation has yet to be considered. It is now under consideration in the House committee, and will be before the Senate, I assume, in time to be enacted by the 1st of July, when the money will be needed. We ourselves could earmark $50,000,000 or any other amount for flood-control work, or we could lift whatever restrictions handicap the expenditure of that money growing out of the $7 per month per man for materials provision. But inasmuch as flood-control work is a very appropriate means of expending money for relief purposes and does employ a fairly large proportion of human beings, it seems to me-and I am sure that is the motive that actuates the President in wanting to do it in that way—that we are justified in leaving the amount in these three items as the committee has reported them, with the understanding, which, of course, will be carried out, that the President will, out of relief funds available, allocate the same amount involved here to be expended for the same purposes.

For that reason I feel constrained to vote in favor of the amendment of the Senate committee to leave these amounts as they were when the House bill was reported and as the committee of the Senate has reported them.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I have no more interest in these projects than has any other Senator, and I realize the interest the Senator from Kentucky, the Democratic leader, has in the prosecution of flood-control work; but if we appropriate $110,000,000 this is what will happen: $20,000,000 of that sum, or approximately $82,000,000, will be earmarked for flood-control work in the Ohio Valley, and under the bill that was passed in 1938 a great portion of that money will be used for the construction of reservoirs, for the purchase of concrete, and other materials. Approximately $30,000,000 of that sum will go to levee construction and floodway construction on the Mississippi and lower Mississippi. It is true we can use relief money in the construction of levees, but it will be difficult, if not impossible, to use it in carrying forward the projects authorized in the 1938 general Flood Control Act.

I think it is not at all the part of wisdom to adopt the committee amendment. I will join the Senator from Kentucky or any other person in removing the restrictions from relief money, but I think I can realize just what we should be up against on that matter. If we should undertake to reach down into the relief bill, carrying a billion and a half or more dollars, and earmark $50,000,000, and apply to its expenditure a different set of rules than that which is applied to the other portion, I am afraid we should encounter difficulties.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that I suppose I am as much interested in flood-control expenditures as is any other Member of the Senate. My home town has voted by over 7 to 1 in an election to issue bonds to enable the city to raise its share of the money to buy rights-of-way and incur other expenses in connection with building a flood wall which would require 5 or 6 years to construct.

Of course there is not enough money carried in this appropriation, even with the extra $50,000,000, to complete these works. From year to year money has to be appropriated until the works are completed; and I should be the last man to want to handicap the War Department engineers or the Government in any way by letting up or lagging in the construction of these flood-control devices.

I myself do not see, however, how these projects will be materially injured, or their construction will be held up or retarded, by the expenditure of this $110,000,000, which is a considerable sum above what we have had available this year or in any year since 1936, when we passed the Flood Control Act. Certainly whatever is available out of relief funds will be added to the $110,000,000, and I think practically all of the extra $50,000,000 can be expended.

I appreciate the point made by the Senator from Arkansas that it is difficult to set up a standard for the expenditure of part of relief funds and not have the same standard apply to all relief; but with regard to flood-control work a different situation probably exists from that which exists with regard to ordinary work of other kinds, such as schoolhouses and streets and sidewalks and highways and other typical W. P. A. construction work. For that reason I do not believe we should encounter that difficulty if the $50,000,000 were expended under the authority of the President and taken out of relief funds.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President-

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Let us get straight, first, just what the amendments are.

On page 7, line 16, $96,000,000 is stricken out and $71,000,000 is inserted. That is the appropriation for rivers and harbors. That is a difference of $25,000,000.

In the appropriation for flood control, $133,000,000 is stricken out and $110,000,000 is inserted. That is a difference of $23,000,000.

Then for flood control on the Mississippi River and tributaries $39,000,000 is stricken out and $37,000,000 is inserted, a difference of $2,000,000.

The total of the three is $50,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Understanding that fact, we are now confronted with the situation as presented by the Senator from Kentucky. He very frankly tells us that the President will hereafter allocate this amount to the appropriate purposes. Therefore, there is not any question as to economy, and no question at all is raised by the bill as to an expenditure that would be excessive, because the President says to us, and the Senator from Kentucky very graciously communicates that word, that he would allocate, out of relief funds, the amount that would be used for these particular items. Perhaps that would be all right, but "you can't most always sometimes tell": and we do not know what might arise between the time of allocation and the time of making the appropriation.

So we have before us a $50,000,000 cut made in the bill by the Senate, the House having passed it. We have the fact, which we know, that ultimately the $50,000,000 will come to us, and that the $50,000,000 will be expended in any event. If that be the case, there is no logical argument for postponing the day and putting those who are in need of flood-control up to an uncertain future.

So I say that every argument made here requires that we should restore the amount provided by the House bill. There would be no question about it otherwise. There ought to be no doubt about our action concerning it.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I wish merely to say from the standpoint of economy, since the Senator from California has mentioned that subject, that I am not always actuated here, as the Senator knows, purely by the question of economy. I believe in a wise economy, but I do not always agree with some of my friends as to what is economy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does anybody?

Mr. BARKLEY. It frequently depends on whose ox is

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. And there is always some goring going on somewhere. But what I had in mind to say was that I dare say that when the relief bill comes in here, the size of it and the fight over it, if there is to be any fight over it, will not hinge on whether this appropriation is added to this bill and therefore to be taken out of that one or not. When the bill comes in here, whatever the amount is that is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and we begin to consider it, in my judgment we are not going to be very meticulous to take out of it the total amount recommended by the committee of $50,000,000 for rivers and harbors or for flood control that may be carried in this bill if we defeat the committee amendment.

In other words, looking at the matter purely from the standpoint of economy, if we add $50,000,000 now to the Budget estimate, when the relief bill comes in we shall probably have the same amount in it, regardless of what we do here; so that in all probability we shall have, with the two appropriations, $50,000,000 more appropriated than we shall have if the recommendation of the committee is adopted, and the President makes his allocation out of the appropriation for relief.

I do not know that that statement appeals to anybody. Mr. JOHNSON of California. I cannot see that it follows at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator said the question of economy was not involved.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is not involved, because the amount is to be allocated by the President, anyway.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the Senator is assuming that if the $50,000,000 is put in here it will not be put in the relief appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I say nobody can foresee that, because when we begin to consider the matter of a billion and threequarters dollars or a billion and a half dollars of appropriations, I do not think we are going to adopt an amendment on the floor reducing that amount by $50,000,000, because we appropriated it in this particular bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It will have to be somewhere in the ultimate bill, because it is to be allocated to

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course. The amount will be carried, I presume, in a lump-sum appropriation, if it is a lump-sum appropriation; or, if it is earmarked for various purposes, it will be available out of the earmarking. But the point I make is that there is no assurance that adding $50,000,000 to this bill is going to result in the subtraction of $50,000,000 from the appropriation bill for relief.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That would be a perfectly legitimate argument if we should stand here and say that we should not appropriate a single dollar, because the whole amount will be allocated in a relief bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Nobody is contending that the whole amount will be allocated. All that anybody is contending. and all that the President has said, is that he will allocate $50,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. But not $110,000,000 or $133,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And $50,000,000 is the exact amount that is in question here.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. So that if the $50,000,000 is to be allocated by the President, then no question of economy at all is involved, nor any question of uncertainty, perhaps, except the uncertainty that might arise in the meantime as to other events.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, at this point I ask that the RECORD show two paragraphs from the testimony of the Chief of Engineers, General Schley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

General Schley. We stated in our annual report for this year, which we habitually state, that we could spend economically in carrying forward the new work authorized by Congress in the next fiscal year $103,000,000 for rivers and harbors and $195,000,000 for fiscal year $103,000,000 for rivers and harbors and $195,000,000 for flood control. Those are the figures we reported. We make that report because that gives the Budget and gives Congress an idea of how we stand, first, on what Congress has approved and second, on the status of the work as to our ability to carry it forward.

As compared with the $103,000,000 for rivers and harbors estimated this year the Budget allowed us $30,000,000, and in the case of flood control, instead of $195,000,000 they allowed us $110,000,000. As to the sufficiency of it I am not able to express myself on that; that is a matter for Congress to determine. We could expend the figures we suggested in our annual report. But I may say that reducing the amount from $103,000,000 to $30,000,000 is a great reduction. That is a 70-percent reduction. reduction. That is a 70-percent reduction.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if the Senate stands by the committee report, the Senate will make available 29 percent of the money requested for river and harbor purposes. If the Senate agrees to the provisions carried by the House bill it will agree to only 53 percent of the request for river and harbor purposes. If the Senate agrees to the provisions of the House bill with regard to the amount for flood control, the Congress will have given only 56 percent of the amount requested by the Board of Engineers. They asked for $195,000,000, and the bill now carries $110,000,000. If we grant the request and increase the amount to $133,-000,000, it will still lack $62,000,000 of equaling the amount the Board of Engineers want to spend.

Mr. President, the issue resolves itself into this: There is no question about the drain on the Treasury. If we do not put the money in this bill and earmark it, it will come out of the relief bill. So in the end the same amount of money will come from the Federal Treasury for river and harbor improvement purposes, and maintenance purposes, and floodcontrol purposes. The question is, Shall it be the policy of the Senate to earmark this money in accordance with the report of the Board of Army Engineers, so that we shall know where it is going to be spent, how much on this authorized project and how much on that authorized project; or shall we reduce the amount, and then place this sum of $50,000,000 in the hands of someone who may spend it without regard to limitations of man-hours and without even being required to spend it on authorized projects or on projects that are now on the program?

Mr. President, the river and harbor improvement program and the flood-control program are congressional programs. The Congress has authorized projects and placed a limitation upon the construction of the projects. We are now attempting to carry forward the construction of those projects, or such of them as the Board of Army Engineers thinks should have priority.

The hearings contain a list of the projects, which are scattered throughout the United States. They are at those points where the Board thinks the money could be spent to the best advantage. If the Senate thinks that the Senate should have something to say about where this $50,000,000 should be spent, we can strike it from the bill and then take $50,000,000 from the relief appropriations and place that in the hands of someone, with restrictions, to be spent at the point where it is desired it should be spent, with restrictions. For my part, I do not agree to that policy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill does not say where the $50,000,000 shall be spent. It is for general flood-control work.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Answering the suggestion that the bill does not specify where the money shall be spent, let me say that the practice is definite; it is understood; the bill is predicated upon the hearings, and the hearings contain a break-down of the several projects. If $110,000,000 for flood control is the limit and $40,000,000 for rivers and harbors is the limit, we can take the hearings and find out how much money goes to one point and how much to another, not that it is in the bill, but it is understood between the Congress and the Board of Engineers that its report is controlling.

If we increase the amount to $133,000,000 for flood control and $55,000,000 for rivers and harbors, we take the other break-down, and in the Senate hearings the break-down is complete, and we will know how much money goes to each project under either proposal.

All the projects are authorized; they have been carefully considered, and they are set forth in the hearings, indicating the points where the Board of Army Engineers thinks the money would do the best good for river and harbor improvement and for flood control.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, Congress can provide in the relief appropriation, if it sees fit to do so, that any money spent for rivers and harbors or flood control should be spent on authorized projects. So Congress could keep control of that matter without leaving it to someone, as the Senator has stated. We could certainly limit the expenditure of the relief money for this purpose to authorized projects, and we could also provide that it should be spent under the control of the Army engineers. There is no trouble about it so far as directing how it shall be spent is concerned, although Congress has never, in its general flood-control policy, designated the particular project on which the money should be spent. It is always a lump-sum appropriation, being left to the President, and, of course, he leaves it largely to the Board of Army Engineers to say where the money shall be spent.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TRUMAN. I am a member of the subcommittee of which the Senator of Oklahoma is chairman, and I am of the opinion that the amendment should be rejected and the original appropriation, as it came from the House, should be provided in the manner first recommended in the bill, for the simple reason that these flood-control projects and these harbor-improvement projects and the improvement projects on the Mississippi River are recommended directly by the Army engineers. The expenditures are made without regard to so much material per man employed, and are made entirely in the interest of flood control and harbor improvement and improvements on the Mississippi River. I am hoping that the Senate will agree to the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wanted to make the additional statement that many of these projects are located in cities and towns for their protection. It seems to me that it is merely the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee as to the fund from which the money will come. I think we ought to follow the established practice, and put the provision in the bill just as the House inserted it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, Congress has undertaken to handle this matter. We have to date authorized the construction of 370 projects. The War Department has actually started the construction of 143 projects. Congress has authorized an appropriation to the extent of $669,-000,000 for building the projects. If this bill should be enacted, and carry the larger sum, it would still take two hundred and some million dollars to complete the projects. The Board of Army Engineers was authorized, inferentially, at least, to organize a corps of assistants to complete this program within a reasonable time. At present the Board of Engineers has a corps of some 65,000 working in all States, and in practically all the counties of all the States. If we cut them down to 29 percent of the money they ask, they will have to throw out of employment a great number of this corps of 65,000, or they will be drawing their salaries without rendering any very good service. Even the amount of money asked for by the bill as it passed the House, and as it will be if the Senate disagrees to the Senate committee amendment, will still be about 50 percent less than they can spend. They are qualified to spend the money. The Congress has authorized the projects, they have their surveying done, they are actually at work on many of the projects. and if we cut down the appropriation they will not have adequate money with which to carry on. I hope the Senate will disagree to the three amendments and reinstate, in effect, the $50,000,000 struck out by the Senate committee.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the chairman of the subcommittee states the correct result in the committee. The majority of the Committee on Appropriations voted, not on a tie vote-

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. A practical tie.

Mr. ADAMS. Ten to three; yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. O, Mr. President, I cannot let that statement stand. Since the matter has been mentioned, on the first vote the vote was 10 to 9, with one member of the committee voting a pocketful of proxies in the majority.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, it is not of any concern, though there is some slight inaccuracy in the situation.

The President in his message, which was a special message on flood control, recommended a certain sum. The Budget recommended the same sum. The House Committee on Appropriations recommended the sum which the President recommended, and the Senate Committee on Appropriations is recommending to the Senate the identical sum recommended by the President, by the Budget, and by the great Committee on Appropriations of the House.

As to the flood control item, with which I am more familiar, in 1938, $30,000,000 was spent on the various projects. In 1939, the current year, $75,000,000 has been spent, more than double the former appropriation. The Budget increased the appropriation to $110,000,000. On the floor of the House there was an attempt to increase that by $23,000,000. So the Senate committee is recommending an increase over the appropriation of $30,000,000 in 1938 to $110,000,000, which is certainly a very substantial increase in the flood-control appropriations. The Budget recommended for rivers and harbors $41,000,000 for maintenance and $30,000,000 for new projects. That was the amount reported by the House committee and recommended by the Senate committee.

This is not a matter of cutting an appropriation; it is a matter of maintaining a very liberal and a very generous Budget recommendation, supported by the President and the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

I am one of those who are interested in economy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California rose.

Mr. ADAMS. I think there is economy in this measure, with all due respect to my distinguished and much loved friend from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

appropriations.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think I can pay the Senator the compliment of saying that he is interested in economy, but he has a very lonesome life here. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. I am aware of that a part of the time. But I have usually had the company of the Senator from California, which has made my life happy, even if lonesome. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, this is the situation as to the amount of money: From the relief appropriations of various kinds in the past 4 years, $513,000,000 has been expended for river and harbor and flood-control purposes; $513,000,000, more than $100,000,000 a year, has been expended from relief

It is suggested that there is no difference between eliminating $50,000,000 a year and having the President allocate it from the relief appropriation. I say there is a very great difference between appropriating $50,000,000 in this bill, to be expended throughout the country mainly on creditable and useful projects, and allocating $50,000,000 from the relief appropriation, which would not increase the relief expenditures, for we appropriate for relief based upon the number of men and women in need. We appropriate, in substance, so much per month.

The use of the relief labor is then provided for. All the President would do would be to designate certain flood-control projects or certain river and harbor projects upon which this labor would be employed. It would not increase the appropriation an iota. It would simply divert labor which would be paid here to be employed elsewhere. In other words, it is not tweedledum and tweedledee. There would be a definite saving of the $50,000,000.

With the permission of the Senate, I wish to have placed in the Record a statement of the Government appropriations which have been made from year to year, beginning with 1873, to show the growth of Government appropriations. Before that is done, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1873 our total appropriations were $291,000,000. The appropriations for the Government moved up, and in 1916 amounted to about $1,114,000,000. We continued to increase the appropriations, and in 1925 the appropriations amounted to $3,700,000,000. The Seventy-fifth Congress, the second and third sessions—that is, the last Congress—appropriated for a single year—that is, the present fiscal year—$11,361,815,000, and the appropriations for 1940 will probably exceed that figure by $2,000,000,000.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Did these tremendous increases bring any decrease in the total of unemployment in the country?

Mr. ADAMS. Unfortunately they have not, and I think that is a reflection upon us, and the manner in which we have expended the money. It seems to me that we have nothing to be proud of when we spend $11,000,000,000 in a fiscal year, and have the unemployment condition which now exists. I think it is time we studied ourselves and our program, and wondered if we were wise, and whether we were on the right track.

NORTH HARBOR OF MINNEAPOLIS

Mr. LUNDEEN. I am particularly interested in the North Harbor project of Minneapolis and Minnesota; in fact, it is a North Harbor for the Northwest, since Minneapolis is our largest city in the Northwest, and is a part of the great Minneapolis-St. Paul metropolitan area with a population of 1.000.000 people.

This harbor must be constructed because it is needed and necessary for the industry of the Northwest. It will not do to leave appropriations like this out of a bill. It is the duty of the Senate to restore the amount necessary to begin this great project.

We, in Minneapolis, have latent facilities for a magnificent harbor where the iron ore of our great iron ranges of northern Minnesota floating down the waterways of the Mississippi can meet the coal of the Mississippi and its tributaries brought up the Mississippi waterway, and here we can build and establish a Pittsburgh of the Northwest. There is abundant manganese in the hills of my native State of South Dakota, near enough to Minneapolis, which can be handled by trucks and railways and brought to meet the iron and coal for the manufacture of steel in our great metropolis.

THE NORTH HARBOR MUST BE CONSTRUCTED

Where there is no vision the people perish. We must have vision and initiative and have the courage to meet the problems of today. The North Harbor must be constructed, and we must have a beginning of that project now before Minneapolis is stricken with industrial paralysis and before its business suffers irreparable loss. When business prospers in Minneapolis there will be jobs for labor and workers in these jobs must receive an American standard of living wage.

The relief situation in our home city now is most difficult, as shown in recent articles in our great newspapers, and that situation can be met in part by the construction of this project and related projects.

AN IDEAL HARBOR

The banks of the Mississippi along the harbor were formerly occupied by great sawmills, which have disappeared. No new buildings have gone in there. The ground is admirably situated on both sides of the river, and both sides of the river are paralleled by great railways. Trucking can be had from the railway to the warehouse and from the warehouse to the river, and likewise from the river to the warehouse and from the warehouse and from the warehouse to the railways, without any gravity difficulties, such as the problems of hills and valleys, because this region is level ground and designed by nature for great industries along the mighty Mississippi.

I most certainly hope that the Senate today will write into this measure the appropriations necessary to bring about this happy result.

I thank the able Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask to have the table to which I referred printed in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am very much in earnest, as the Senate knows, with respect to economy matters. I have sat here on the floor of the Senate, and in connection with measure after measure I have voted for governmental economy. I have voted for appropriations for the construction of battleships; I have voted for appropriations for the Army; I have voted for measures dealing with all manner of preparation for defense. But I say to the Senate that the most vital element of American defense is the American credit, and that credit we are allowing to go unprotected. We have great floating debts which will impair our defensive capacity. Every time the Congress adds unnecessarily to the deficit, to the debt of this country, it is weakening the defensive measures of our land.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

that reason are not included.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wonder how it is, then, that our loans are oversubscribed so abundantly each time, and at a very low rate of interest. I ask for information.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall be very glad to tell the Senator my opinion; I do not say that it is information. Throughout the country there are millions of unemployed men, as the Senator from Minnesota has mentioned. They mean idle factories, or at least factories only partially in operation. The result is that money which, under proper conditions, would be used in manufacturing in other industries, in employing men, is cumulating in the banks and lying there idle. When we put men to work we put money to work. When we put money to work we put men to work. The cumulating of money is a bad system for us. It may have only one good result, that available money may be the means by which we can move forward.

PURCHASE OF DANISH AND DUTCH POSSESSIONS IN AMERICA

Mr. LUNDEEN. If the Senator will permit me further, it has been my intention for some time to address the Senate further on the subject of the purchase of Dutch possessions in North America, and on the purchase of the Danish possessions in North America. I have hesitated to intrude myself into this very interesting and important debate, but with the indulgence of the Senate, I hope to have the opportunity to bring to the attention of the Senators this most important program of national defense, so vital to the defense of our Panama Canal and our entire Atlantic seaboard. It is vital to aircraft and the air services both to Europe and to the Pan American line.

I ask the attention of the American people to the purchase of these possessions, which must not be further delayed.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I do not want to take more time than I should on this matter. It is a matter, as I said, in which the committee is supporting the Budget. In 1938 in the rivers and harbors bill there was appropriated $128,-000,000. Of that there was expended only $67,000,000, leaving a balance of $61,000,000.

In 1939 there was appropriated $112,000,000. I do not have available the figures for the expenditures, but I assume that the expenditures were at a corresponding rate, which means that there is available now, in addition to the present appropriation, a sum of $50,000,000 to $60,000,000.

Mr. President, every Senator, I believe, has been flooded with telegrams. A propaganda has been inaugurated and telegrams have been sent, mostly under the name of a particular association in Washington. Those telegrams say "Vote to restore the $50,000,000 cut." They do not explain to Senators why it should be done. Telegrams were sent to my State, and I do not speak from hearsay, because as a result half a dozen or more telegrams have come to me telling me to vote against the cut. They even told me that the cut had caused the elimination of projects in my State.

Those who sent the telegrams were acting without information and endeavoring to put pressure upon the Congress. They did not know the merits of the measure, and they did not care. They are for an appropriation; the bigger the appropriation the better they are suited. As I said, it is a propaganda based upon lack of information. Telegrams have been sent, but those who sent them did not know what the facts were.

The money proposed to be added will start comparatively few new projects, either flood control or river and harbor projects. In the main, the $23,000,000 flood-control item and the $25,000,000 river and harbor item merely mean increased expenditures upon existing projects. The same argument could be made as to why we should appropriate the full amount necessary to complete the projects.

The Army engineers are a very able group. They are fine engineers. They also are aware of the weaknesses of those of us who sit in Congress; and if Senators will examine the distribution of projects throughout the United States, they will find that the Army engineers in their distribution have recognized the desirability of a proper distribution of projects.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Did the Senator in his previous remarks refer to the National Rivers and Harbors Congress?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. Will the Senator permit me to read the telegram?

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator will.

Mr. BYRNES. I read as follows:

ORVILLE BULLINGTON,

Wichita Falls, Tex.:

Senate Appropriations Committee today cut $50,000,000 from river and harbor and flood-control appropriation as passed by House. Please wire or phone your Senators immediately to vote to restore House figure. Senate expected to vote Monday. Appreciate your cooperation.

NATIONAL RIVERS AND HARBORS CONGRESS.

WICHITA FALLS, TEX., May 27, 1939.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed I hand you original of telegram which I received requesting me to protest against your cut of $50,000,000 from the river and harbor and flood-control appropriations. Instead of protesting I desire to approve and endorse your action. Your cut is not big enough.

Individuals and groups relet

Individuals and groups must realize that taxes cannot be reduced without reducing expenditures, and if expenditures are not reduced without reducing expenditures, and if expenditures are not reduced our country is headed for bankruptcy, and that in the very near future. The mountain of debt under which the American people now stagger is impossible of payment, and a great proportion of it will certainly be repudiated outright or by the further devaluation of the dollar. The next generation will in all probability be intelligent enough to refuse payment of the debts which have been foisted upon the country in the name of emergency, without regard to emergencies which must necessarily be faced by future generations.

As a former director of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress I trust that the individuals and groups composing your organization will have guts enough to resist the temptation to raid the Treasury in its present depleted condition.

Very truly yours,

ORVILLE BULLINGTON.

Has the Senator from Colorado received any telegrams from chambers of commerce?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. I notice the United States Chamber of Commerce recently met in Washington and criticized the administration and the Congress for the expenditure of money. I have received letters from the chamber of commerce in Columbia, the capital city of South Carolina, urging me to restore this $50,000,000, and I understand other chambers of commerce have sent similar letters, and I wondered if, in the Senator's own State, the chambers of commerce have likewise been asking for the restoration in the bill of the $50,000,000.

Mr. ADAMS. The telegram sent by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and read by the Senator from South Carolina is identical with the one that was sent throughout my State. There is no individual name signed to it. It is simply signed "National Rivers and Harbors Congress." The sending of such telegrams by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress resulted in telegrams being sent to me. I have projects in my State. It is alleged they will receive additional money if the $50,000,000 is put back in the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator again

yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I just wish to state that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] advises me that the gentleman who addressed the letter to the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Orville Bullington, is a very staunch and active Republican in the State of Texas.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. Con-

NALLY] whether that is not correct?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Bullington is a very distinguished and outstanding Republican, a very fine gentleman, and a man of considerable means, as well as of brains.

Mr. BYRNES. I should like to say to the Senator from Colorado that I am glad there is one distinguished and outstanding Republican who shares our views with respect to saving some money now and then.

Mr. JOHNSON of California rose.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I should like to ask one question. Does the Senator resent the receipt of that telegram, whoever received it?

Mr. BYRNES. On the contrary, I have just said that the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee received it. Certainly, so far as the Senator from South Carolina is concerned, he is glad to know that there is one distinguished Republican who is in favor of voting for economy at some time during this session.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Exactly. There are several—only several, perhaps—but there is only one Democrat in this body who is in favor of economy, and that is the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. BYRNES. Is the Senator from California for this particular measure of economy, increasing the appropriation by $50,000,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. When the President says to us, "If you take out this $50,000,000, I will allot it out of the relief bill by-and-by," where is the saving?

Mr. BYRNES. Suppose we take it the other way. If the $50,000,000 is now appropriated in this bill, will the Senator from California vote to reduce the relief bill by $50,000,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not necessarily.

Mr. BYRNES. Then the Senator wants to increase the appropriation in the pending bill by $50,000,000, but he would not vote to take $50,000,000 from the other bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No. I am merely saying that I will not pledge myself to any specific conduct in the future. I do not want to put our people in the position of relying upon an uncertainty in the future. However, the President has charge of the funds. The President will make his allocation. The President will see that the $50,000,000 is accounted for when it comes to the relief funds; and the President says it will be allotted in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Adams] has the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. ADAMS. I had yielded to the Senator from California. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. It will be necessary to include in the relief bill a provision which has heretofore been carried, authorizing the funds to be used for flood control, because it is a Federal project for which there is no sponsor's contribution, and therefore it would not be left entirely to the President to allot the $50,000,000. The provision heretofore carried in the relief bill will have to be continued.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I was quoting the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Barkley], who said that the $50,000,000, if not allowed in the pending bill, would be allotted by the President out of relief funds.

Mr. BYRNES. That can be done only if the Congress authorizes it to be done. If it is not authorized, it cannot be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator is discussing one of the uncertainties to which I referred. As I said a little while ago, "You can't most always sometimes tell." We might be in a situation in which we would not receive the $50,000,000 when the occasion came for its allotment; but we rest today upon the promise of the President to allot it. The President promising to allot it, of course he would keep faith and allot it; and therefore there is no economy at all in this matter.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator from Colorado will yield-

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. If that statement be correct, and we can rely upon the Senator, if we should add $50,000,000 to the present bill we should simply be providing $100,000,000 instead of $50,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not at all. If the $50,000,000 were taken out of the pending bill, it would be allotted by the President provided we were deprived of it by virtue of the way in which the bill reads. That is all.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there is a current misunderstanding about the way in which relief bills are framed. Relief bills appropriate a definite sum of money. We do not earmark and we do not allot portions of the relief appropriation. We do provide limitations. We provide that not more than a certain part may be spent on highways, not more than a certain amount may be spent for flood control, and not more than a certain amount may be spent on other activities. However, there has not been a definite allocation; and flood relief and river and harbor improvements have been appropriate activities for the employment of relief labor. I think that is all that would be involved. There would be the privilege of using relief labor on these projects.

Mr. President, it is growing late. I shall not take any further time, except to say to the Senate that flood-control work in the United States has gone forward at a very rapid pace. Enormous sums have been appropriated. River and harbor improvements have gone forward at a tremendous pace. There is no emergency. There is no requirement for the additional money; and knowing the President and the Budget officers, I think Senators are not justified in turning down the President's recommendations, the Budget recommendations, and the recommendations of the Appropriations Committee of the House by adding an unneeded $50,000,000 at this time of great financial stress.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not true that the vote

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not true that the vote will come upon the adoption of the committee amendment, and those who are in favor of the larger sum will vote "nay"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will come on the second committee amendment, to be found on page 7. For the information of the Senate, the amendment will again be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, line 16, the committee proposes to strike out "$96,000,000" and insert "$71,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Flood control", on page 8, line 25, after the word "law", to strike out "$133,000,000" and insert "$110,000,000", so as to read:

FLOOD CONTROL

Flood control, general: For the construction and maintenance of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes, in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act, approved June 22, 1936, as amended and supplemented, including printing and binding, newspapers, law books, books of reference, periodicals, and office supplies and equipment required in the Office of the Chief of Engineers to carry out the purposes of this appropriation, the purchase (not to exceed $149,500) of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motor-boats for official use, and for preliminary examinations and surveys of flood-control projects authorized by law, $110,000,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 23, after the word "use", to strike out "$39,000,000" and insert "$37,000,-000", so as to read:

Flood control, Mississippi River and tributaries: For prosecuting work of flood control in accordance with the provisions of the Flood Control Act approved May 15, 1928, as amended (33 U. S. C. 702a), including printing and binding, newspapers, law books, books of reference, periodicals, and office supplies and equipment required in the Office of the Chief of Engineers to carry out the purposes of this appropriation, and for the purchase (not to exceed $51,400) of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motorboats for official use, $37,000,000.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to repeat the statement I previously made on the flood-control item. In 1938, $30,000,000 was appropriated; in 1939, $75,000,000 was appropriated; and the committee amendment provides $110,000,000, a very liberal and adequate appropriation.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President— Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, is not this amendment the $2,000,000 amendment?

Mr. ADAMS. No; that has been rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That has already been voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the information of the Senate, the pending amendment will be restated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 23, the committee proposes to strike out "$39,000,000" and to insert "$37,000,000."

Mr. ADAMS. I thought that amendment had been rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment had not been disposed of when the Senator from Colorado rose, and therefore the Chair recognized him.

Mr. ADAMS. I thought it had been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 9, line 23.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there is some confusion. I was told that the amendment which was pending was the $2,000,000 amendment, which I thought had been disposed of, and I was asking for the yeas and nays on the third amendment, which was the flood-control amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has endeavored to protect every Senator. The amendments were stated. On the second committee amendment, on page 7, upon which there was doubt, there was a division at the request of the Senator from Colorado. The next amendment was stated, and it was rejected viva voce. The present occupant of the chair desires in every possible way to protect every Senator, but it seems that at the present state of the proceedings it will be necessary for the Senator to ask unanimous consent for reconsideration, or make a motion.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which the flood-control amendment, on page 8, line 25, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment on page 8, line 25, was rejected? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The clerk will again state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, line 25, the committee proposes to strike out "$133,000,000" and to insert "$110,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 8, line 25.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 8, line 25.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I am authorized by the committee to submit an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, at the end of line 13, after the word "law", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That funds appropriated herein may be used to execute detailed surveys, prepare plans and specifications, and procure options on land and property necessary for the construction of authorized flood-control projects or for flood-control projects considered for selection in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the Flood Control Act approved June 28, 1938: Provided further, That the expenditure of funds for completing the necessary surveys and securing options shall not be construed as a commitment of the Government to the construction of any project.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 13, after the word "law", it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That the conditions of local cooperation for the Memphis, Tenn., flood-control project, authorized by the Flood Control Act approved August 28, 1937, shall be so modified that the cost of providing pumping stations and outlet works for interior drainage shall be borne by the United States, all in accordance with plans to be approved by the Chief of Engineers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on page 5, line 24, we find the title "Rivers and Harbors." I am advised by the Chief of Engineers that the title should not appear on page 5, line 24, but instead should appear on page 6, between lines 2 and 3. That is in order to make the bill conform to the precedents and the bill of last year. I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, between lines 7 and 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

Custer Battlefield National Cemetery, Mont., historical museum: For the erection and maintenance, by the Secretary of War, of a public historical museum within the Custer Battlefield National Cemetery, Mont., $75,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton], and in his name, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 13, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the reservoir and other flood-control works on Bayou Bodeau and Cypress Bayou, La., authorized by the Flood Control Act approved June 28, 1938, shall be constructed in accordance with the revised plans and cost estimates now in the office, Chief of Engineers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma on behalf of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton].

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 1939

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Reverend S. J. Ryder, pastor of St. John's Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, who hast given to human destinies the ebb and flow of fortune and adversity, we stand humbly before Thee and ask for Thy divine guidance.

We call upon Thy paternal beneficence to open wide the portals of our souls so that the deep significance of this session might take root in our minds.

We realize our opportunities of adding a power, austere and grand, to our national life, but we realize that these opportunities must be blessed and beautified by Thy divine wisdom. As Members of an honorable body in our Republic, we have entered a higher realm of love, namely, a love of mankind, a love of justice, and a love of the right. In this higher realm we must make decisions in relation to human wisdom, human needs, and human circumstances, but they must be interpreted in relation to Thy divine will. We wish, therefore, to be reliable units in that glorious line of predecessors and bear aloft the auroral truth that no country can exist with hopes of civilization unless the minds of its political and financial leaders are motivated by Thy divine principles of justice and charity, marked by fortitude, prudence, and moderation.

A plenitude of thought and good will, together with a plenitude of Thy divine assistance, is the blessing we ask. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2390. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. Barkley and Mr. Gibson members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

- 1. Department of Agriculture.
- 2. Department of Commerce.
- 3. Department of the Interior.
- 4. Department of Justice.
- 5. Department of Labor.
- 6. Department of the Navy.
- 7. Department of the Treasury.
- 8. Department of War.
- 9. Post Office Department.
- 10. Federal Housing Administration.
- 11. Northwest Territory Celebration Commission.
- 12. The Panama Canal.
- 13. United States Civil Service Commission.
- 14. United States Tariff Commission.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REVENUE BILL

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion on yesterday the time was so limited that no one had an opportunity to discuss in detail the Townsend bill, and particularly the tax features. I have here a real Robert Ripley story. Yesterday there was introduced in the House H. R. 6577, to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and, as Robert Ripley would say, "Believe it or not," title VI of that bill, on page 104 of the bill, paragraph 1, provides for a tax on the privilege of doing business, a tax based on gross business receipts in the District of Columbia, which is practically the tax formula of the Townsend bill. The only difference is that the rate of tax in the Townsend bill is one-half of 1 percent, and in the District of Columbia revenue bill it is four-tenths of 1 percent, or one-tenth of 1 percent less.

I ask our opposition to laugh that off if they can. In other words, we are about to adopt for the District of Columbia a tax measure which contains practically the same tax formula as is contained in H. R. 6466, the Townsend bill, introduced by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Hendricks], which we will vote upon in a few moments.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Hendricks]?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to this request, but the debate on the Townsend bill has continued nearly 4 hours. There are 18 minutes remaining. If we allow Members to speak for 1 minute, there will probably be a dozen or twenty requests. We want to get through. I hope no other Member will ask unanimous consent to speak on the Townsend bill because general debate will be continued on this bill in a few minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not understand whether the majority leader is going to object to any more 1-minute speeches. If he is going to object, we will have to start objecting now. I would like to get a minute this morning if I can.

Mr. RAYBURN. On what?

Mr. RICH. To speak on the great national debt that this administration has created.

Mr. RAYBURN. I referred to debate on the Townsend plan and 1-minute requests to speak thereon. That is all I had in mind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Hendricks]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to debate the Townsend plan. I simply wish to say that I have always observed that the affirmative had the opportunity for rebuttal. I understood the debate on this bill would be concluded yesterday by both proponents and opponents. I have discovered, however, that the opponents have reserved a speaker on each side to speak today. We do not have a chance to answer in rebuttal, but I am sure the Members of the House will vote their minds instead of being changed by last-minute remarks which cannot be answered.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Vorys]?

There was no objection.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is so much that is good in this latest Townsend bill that I would like to vote for it, but there is so much that is bad that I have finally decided to vote against it, since the New Deal "gag" rule forbidding amendments gives me no other choice. The bill provides pay-as-you-go pensions and repeals the high taxes and phony reserve fund of social security. That is good. But it taxes too many people too many times, makes too many people eligible for pensions, and the tax is in a form that violates the Constitution, according to recent Supreme Court decisions. That is bad, and cannot be corrected under this un-American "gag" rule. This bill would cost the people of Ohio three hundred millions a year, according to the best estimate I can find. I still favor full hearing and consideration of this bill. We have not had it yet, and never will while the New Deal controls the House.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Darden].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Satterfield]?

There was no objection.

THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, when I came into this Hall this morning one of the distinguished gentlemen on the majority side said, "I hope you do not make any speeches this morning." He did not want to hear about the national debt or where you are going to get the money in order to carry on for this administration.

I wish to call your attention to the fact that according to the Treasury statement of May 27 you are now $3,212,000,000 in the red for this year, a dreadful financial position. The appropriations you have made for 1940 already total over $7,576,000,000, and I herewith give a list of them:

VOTE ON THE TOWNSEND BILL

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Gehrmann] was called home day before yesterday because of the death of his daughter, Mrs. Irving Justice, of Mellen, Wis. The gentleman from Wisconsin, who is a strong supporter of the Townsend bill, hoped to be here to make a speech in its favor and to vote for it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including therein a letter from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GEHRMANN] explaining his situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the letter to which I refer is as follows:

HOD. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD.

Hon. William B. Bankhead,

Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Speaker: I would appreciate it very much, if it is permissible, to have the Clerk read or insert in the Record the fact that I was called home by the sudden death of my daughter. I am very much interested in H. R. 6466 and intended to take the floor in favor of it during the debate. Had it been possible for me to be present when the vote was taken, I would have voted "tree" on pressent of the bill

"yes" on passage of the bill. Very truly yours,

B. J. GEHRMANN Tenth Wisconsin District.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the time for debate on H. R. 6466 has been limited. I also regret that many Members, apparently, have not even read the bill. They oppose it on the ground that it proposes to pay everyone a pension of $200 per month when the bill actually says no such thing. It merely provides that a certain tax shall be levied and the proceeds divided among the applicants for the pension. The author of the bill stated in his speech to this House yesterday that the initial payment would be $60 or $70 per month.

Under the rule we cannot amend this bill, no matter what change we would like to make. Regardless of this, I am supporting this bill because I approve the principle for which it

In my opinion, a national plan of old-age security is inevitable. The duty rests upon Congress to select and approve the best plan available. We enacted the Social Security Act: this was a forward step in social legislation, but does not and cannot meet the needs of millions of our citizens. The farmer who tills his own farm and a man who conducts his own business may find themselves wholly without resources at the age of 60. At the present time only 50 percent of those gainfully employed are covered by the Social Security Act at any one time. While some may be brought within the provisions of the Social Security Act by amendment, there are many millions of people who can never hope to secure old-age assistance under this legislation.

Prior to the enactment of the Social Security Act the socalled Townsend plan was suggested to the American people. Objections were raised to it on the grounds that the $200 per month was excessive and that adequate provision was not made to finance the plan, thereby necessitating a continuing national deficit to meet the payments of those making claim.

The present Townsend bill meets these fundamental objections. First, by raising the necessary revenue in the act itself; and, second, by providing that no funds shall be paid until they are first collected. There can be no inflation or printing-press money under a pension plan which provides that expenditures shall be limited to the income derived under the bill. The bill provides a plan of taxation, the proceeds to be used solely in financing the old-age security of every citizen of the United States who has attained the age of 60

The plan of having a particular tax for a particular purpose is most desirable and has demonstrated its effectiveness in those States where gasoline-tax revenues have been limited solely for the construction and maintenance of roads. It is also adopted as fundamentally sound in the present Social Security Act, where a specific tax is levied for the sole purpose of old-age security.

The Townsend plan, as embodied in the present bill, will accomplish more desirable ends than all the legislation that has been enacted for many years. In the first place, it will equalize and guarantee justice to every eligible citizen of the United States by assuring them an equal amount of money for their support. This is not done under the Social Security Act, where persons of equal need may receive $10 in one State and $30 in another, or where people in the same town within one State may receive twice as much as their neighbor. The Townsend plan, by treating every eligible person the same, will remove all politics from the pension system, which has been made a political football in many States.

Instead of being harmful to the Social Security Act, the Townsend plan will be definitely beneficial. The Social Security Act provides that aid shall be given to dependent children. Because of lack of funds, thousands of such children in Ohio and elsewhere are unable to receive a cent of help. Last year Ohio spent over $16,000,000 as its share in matching Federal funds for old-age pensions. If a national plan for old-age pensions is adopted, Ohio will have sufficient money to fully provide for every dependent child in the State and still have several million dollars left with which to meet every obligation of her schools, now seriously crippled for lack of funds.

The present bill provides that the money collected shall be equitably distributed to every American citizen over 60 years of age and requires that such citizen give up all gainful employment. At the present time there are several million people over 60 years of age who continue working because the present old-age pension system will not give them sufficient funds for a decent living. No one can predict accurately the amount of money that would be available to each claimant under the Townsend plan, but certainly it will be sufficient to permit these millions to give up their work, thereby opening positions to millions of young people who are now unemployed. Making adequate provision for the elderly people now working and then requiring them to give up their work would do more to promote employment than anything attempted by the Congress. The need for large relief and public works appropriations would rapidly diminish. No elderly person who has a position can be expected to leave it for a $15 or $20 per month pension. Pay him an adequate pension and he will be happy to permit some younger man to take his place.

This bill will also make it unnecessary for the Government to collect the present tax for old-age pensions levied under the Social Security Act, thereby saving much money and inconvenience on the part of employers and employees. It has safeguards to prevent a recipient of the pension from keeping relatives and friends in idleness. It also has a very sane principle which will be welcome to every businessman in the country, because the bill provides that everyone receiving the pension must pay their current bills for food, clothing, and necessities. In addition to the payment of their current bills, 10 percent of the money received must be used for payment of all past debts, thereby benefiting every businessman with a number of debts owing, which, under existing circumstances, he cannot collect.

The so-called Townsend bill is very much misunderstood by great sections of our population, but, regardless of the objections raised to the original plan, the modified plan now before Congress is a sound, sane, and conservative measure. It forbids the hoarding of pension funds by requiring those receiving pensions to put the money into circulation for the stimulation of business. Thus it will increase purchasing power, give security to the aged by retiring them with a reasonable income, open employment to younger citizens, remove injustices and inequalities in the present pension system, repeal the tax burden for pensions under the Social Security Act, and will remove a great tax burden from the shoulders of every State, permitting them to make more effective the other provisions of the Social Security Act. It will also make it unnecessary to build great reserves in a social-security fund, a plan which is viewed with alarm by nearly every businessman and financial institution.

I am convinced that a national system of old-age security is certain to come, and I feel that House bill 6466 as it is now drafted is the most sensible and conservative method now before the American people to accomplish this end. It is good business to spend only that which you collect, because in this way we avoid great debt and printing-press money. Since this bill will prevent ultimate inflation and will contribute a large number of substantial benefits to the welfare of the Nation, I wish to urge every Member of this House to support it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein an editorial from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. Larrabee asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the Record.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein a Memorial Day address delivered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Springer] at Muncie, on May 30.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

VOTE ON THE TOWNSEND BILL

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Ashbrook, is unable to be present. He requested the pair clerk to pair him against the so-called Townsend bill, but no pair could be secured. Therefore, he requests me to announce that if he were present he would vote "nay" on the bill today.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, about an hour from now I will cast my vote against the Townsend bill, now known as H. R. 6466.

I do know that thousands of elderly citizens will be disappointed if and when H. R. 6466 is defeated. They will be disappointed because they have been led to believe that the Townsend plan is feasible and sound; that if enacted into law our economic troubles would be over. I respect those who honestly believe in the Townsend plan, but I must cast my vote for what I believe to be in the best interest of our country. What good would it do if we provided every citizen over 60 years of age with an annuity of $50, $100, $200, or even $300, per month for a few months or a year if by so doing we brought chaos, inflation, and ruin to all of our people. That is what I believe would happen if the provisions of H. R. 6466 were enacted into law. My opinion is supported by the testimony of every economist who testified before our Ways and Means Committee. It is supported by such organizations as the A. F. of L., the Grange, the Federal Farm Bureau, and by businessmen, large and small.

If it were possible, I would like to see every person over 60 receive an annuity of $200 monthly. If it did not mean ruin, I would like to add to the list the widows of the comrades I left buried in France—I would like to add every widow who is in need.

Call it what you will—a transaction tax, a sales tax, or what not—it means that to make this plan effective we would have to tax everyone, rich or poor, on even the necessities of life, from four to fifteen billion dollars per year. It just cannot be done.

Far be it from me to question the sincerity of Dr. Townsend, but this I will say: His hands are not absolutely clean. Do you recall the little story in his newspaper in which an effort was made to mislead his followers by telling them wonderful progress had been made since the last session of Congress, as indicated by the fact that his bill was now No. 2 on the whole list of bills introduced. It seems like poetic justice that H. R. 2 has been discarded and we now have the bill before us known as 6466.

Does it not mean something when we find that after 4 months of hearings there is not a member in either party on the Ways and Means Committee who would move to recommend this bill to the House? We have to take the bill as is; we cannot amend it at all. If we vote to recommit it to committee for perfecting, we are to be listed as against the Townsend plan. This, in spite of the fact that Dr. Townsend testified—

I concede that there will have to be amendments to the bill.

Several advocates of this plan have pointed out that this bill does not provide $200 a month. However, that is the minimum to be hoped for. That is what Townsend Club members have been led to believe they will receive. What did Dr. Townsend say as to the amount of annuity? I quote:

Two hundred a month will not stay long. We will go on to three hundred; we must inevitably.

Let us lay this dream bill away and devote the rest of the week to considering amendments to the Social Security Act. Let us see what we can do for our senior citizens instead of talking about what we would like to do.

Before I close may I raise one point that may be considered purely sentimental, although I believe it goes even deeper than that. Suppose brass rings and fairies did exist and this plan was made workable, what would we have done? We would have destroyed one of the finest things in our American life, namely, the family spirit. We would take from thousands the joy of caring for their parents; the privilege of making their declining years happy. Oh, I know thousands have little or nothing to share with anyone, but that is a temporary condition. If we keep our heads, we will work out of these unhappy economic conditions. We grew into a great nation by practicing thrift, by having a Government that encouraged thrift. From our thrift came the capital to expand small business into huge industries, employing thousands.

This is still the land of opportunity, and those who will vote "no" on H. R. 6466 have voted to preserve the system that made us great.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a radio program sponsored by former Congressman Binderup.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and eighty-one Members are present, a quorum.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6466) to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment; to provide a method whereby citizens shall contribute to the purchase of and receive a retirement annuity: to provide for the raising of the necessary revenue to operate a continuing plan therefor; to provide for the appropriation and expenditure of such revenue; to provide for the proper administration of this act; to provide penalties for violation of the act; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6466, with Mr. SMITH of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the Committee that at the conclusion of the session yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] had consumed 1 hour and 51 minutes, which leaves him 9 minutes; and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] had consumed 1 hour and 52½ minutes, which leaves him 7½ minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues on the Republican side, particularly, to you with faint hearts and faltering feet let me address a last-minute word before the roll call is sounded.

This bill is, in my judgment, more absurd than has been painted on the floor of this House. Must I remind you that under this bill, if you will examine the definition of the word "persons," the definition of "gross revenues," and the incidence of the tax, that the 76 railroads that are in receivership and are knocking on the door of Congress today for rehabilitation will be taxed on their gross revenues? Must I remind you that the farm bill contains $725,000,000 of benefits out of the Federal Treasury for farm benefits, but, on the other hand, the Secretary of the Treasury shall reach out and take back a tax from the farmers in the Nation? Must I remind you that every financial house, every commission merchant who does business on less than 2 percent anywhere in this country will be rocked out of business?

They say to me, "Oh, you are concerned with property values, while we are concerned with human values," and I say to them that they are seeking to destroy the very sources of revenue from which the payment under this bill must be made. If it passes this House and is analyzed by the newspapers of the country, oh, what ridicule and invective will be directed against those who have cast a responsible vote in order to see the enactment of a bill of this kind.

In our Republican platform of 1936 we favored direct, adequate pension payment provided from a direct tax widely distributed, but does that commit anybody who is pledged to the Townsend plan to vote for a monstrosity? Ah, no, you of faint heart, it does not.

Now, May 23 is a celebrated day. On that day this bill that is pending was introduced. On that day both houses of the Illinois Legislature approved a $40 pension. On that day I had a visitor in my office at exactly 10:30 o'clock. He was a high official of the Townsend organization. We sat down to visit and I pointed out the defects, and, finally, here is what he said, and I made careful note of it before he left my office to make sure the statement would not be distorted.

His first statement was that they did not expect the bill to pass. The second statement was that a constitutional amendment is necessary, and they are basing their plans upon the Senate in the hope that a resolution will be initiated looking to a constitutional amendment. Third, he said to me that the experts have advised the Townsend group that it would take at least 1 year to bring up a satisfactory bill. Everybody knows that the bill that is before us has been drawn up very hastily, full of loopholes, full of ramifications that would destroy this country. Finally, this official of the Townsend national organization said to me—and mark you, everybody in this Chamber—"We do not want this bill to pass."

Now, let any proponent of this legislation stand in his place and ask me who that gentleman was. I shall not disclose his name myself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Who said that?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman was Mr. Jeffery, the vice president of the national Townsend organization. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one further question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I cannot yield further.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I stand by that statement, gentlemen; make no mistake about it. I am going to render a service to the aged of America today and to those who are looking to this organization, not for a couple of birds in the bush but for a bird in the hand; I am going to perform them a service by voting against this bill and not hoodwinking them.

It was said a few moments ago by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Smith] that yesterday there was introduced in the Congress a bill applying to the District of Columbia, to provide for a business privilege tax. Yes, my kind friend, I helped to draw the first business privilege tax in the District of Columbia more than 3 years ago. Go back and examine the bill and see what is in it. Note the refinements we made there, how carefully we had to define the financial dealings, the commissions paid to commission merchants, how we had to straighten out the spread and graduate the tax. Despite all the caution we could exercise, there have been 500 suits pending in the courts of the District of Columbia as a result of the best work that our committee might bring to that job.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Compare that, Mr. Chairman, with the thing that is before us today, and you will see that the bill is a hodgepodge, and Mr. Jeffery knew whereof he spoke when he said the experts had advised that it would take at least a year or more in which to perfect the bill. Are you, my friends, going to be in the position of sending this kind of a hybrid bill over to rest in a pigeonhole on the other side of this building? Are you going to stimulate the newspapers and the press of the country to analyze this bill for the first time in 5 years and rake you and everybody else over every editorial column from the Atlantic to the Pacific and cover you with ridicule and abuse? Are you ready for that? I shall share mine on the other side, and I shall go back and make a report to the aged people and say, "I am committed to a pay-as-you-go policy; I am committed to a generous policy, but I am not committed to vote for a hybrid monstrosity under the guise of a tax bill that will ruin the country and do exactly no good for the aged people of the coun-' Once more I say to you-

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Once more I say to you, particularly, my colleagues on this side of the aisle, whose hearts may have been faint, whose feet may have faltered a little, there is something more than pensions in the balance, and that is the economic structure of the United States of America. That is in the balance today. [Applause.] I am not willing to surrender upon that line.

Let me close with this one thought. I think it was Caesar

Cowards die many times before their deaths; The valiant never taste of death but once

There is not a man in public life who has not died politically over and over as crucial and controversial roll calls have been sounded. I experience it today, even as I experienced it on the first controversial vote I ever cast, when I voted against that notorious economy bill in 1933. I find always that when you square away with conscience you can stand upon firm ground and defend your case, and there, I say to you, my fellow Republicans, we must resolve the issue now, and henceforth let that be your guide when the roll is intoned. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCor-

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield briefly, because I have agreed to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I have a brief letter that I want to read. First, let me say that if Mr. Jeffrey made the statement ascribed to him he will be discharged.

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not yield for that. I yielded for the letter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have a letter to read here from Dr. Townsend, and it is as follows:

> TOWNSEND NATIONAL RECOVERY PLAN, INC., Washington, D. C., June 1, 1939.

Hon. Joe Hendricks,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Hendricks: The bill H. R. 6466 contains the principles of the Townsend plan. I understand there will be a motion made to recommit the bill.

Regardless of the contents of this motion, the friends of this plan will not be fooled as to its intent. Any vote in favor of the motion will be viewed as an effort to scuttle the Townsend bill and will be so considered by its millions of supporters in this country.

Respectfully,

Dr. FRANCIS E. TOWNSEND.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, there is no question but what if the pending bill was voted on through a secret ballot it would not probably receive a vote.

It is a straight pension plan under the color that by taxing nine persons to pay one person $200 a month pension that recovery can be brought back to the country. There is not a Member of this House who in his heart and mind feels that economic recovery will be brought about by any such method as this. The regrettable thing is the number of good, sincere persons to whom "the wish is father to the hope" who are being misled.

These good persons believe that they are going to get $200 a month no matter how one might argue or apologize to the contrary; that is what they have been promised; that is what they expect; and yet the very proponents of this bill know that it comes nowhere near accomplishing that objective, and all the while good people throughout the country are making their contributions, which they cannot afford, to a cause that cannot succeed, and if successful would result only in economic chaos to all and despair to those who are making their monetary contributions. Dr. Townsend admitted before the Committee on Ways and Means that the Chicago office during the past 5 years had received $3,000,000 from dues, which did not include contributions used for field operations, which amounts to 40 percent, and which did not also include special collections nor the profits of the Townsend Weekly.

It must be borne in mind that no economist appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in favor of the pending bill.

A number of economists and businessmen, and the American Retail Federation, comprising about 178,000 members, appeared in opposition to it. The American Retail Federation made a survey of its members, and a representative of this association appeared before the committee and testified that the opposition to the bill was unanimous.

Every Member who votes for this bill is voting for the most dangerous type of supersales tax ever proposed. Any opponent of any man who votes for this bill can properly accuse him of voting for a super sales tax.

The tax proposed under this bill falls the heaviest upon the people least able to pay, persons of moderate and small incomes

The Brookings Institute shows that at the end of 1929, and that was supposed to be a year of prosperity, there were 27,470,000 families in the United States consisting of more than 1 person; that about 6,000,000 families, or more than 21 percent of the total, had incomes less than $1,000 per year; that about 12,000,000 families, or more than 42 percent of the total, had incomes of less than $1,500 per year; that nearly 20,000,000 families, or about 71 percent of the total, had incomes less than $2,500 per year; that in the case of unattached individuals nearly 82 percent had incomes below $2,000; also, and this is significant, that 84 percent of all the consuming goods sold in the country were bought by families with incomes of $5,000 less.

Mark you, this was in 1929, not 1939, when income had sharply decreased from the 1929 figures, when so many millions of our persons are directly or indirectly upon relief. The income per family today is much less than it was in

The passage of this bill will reduce the purchasing power of 9 out of 10 persons at least 25 percent in order to pay the pensions provided herein. In other words, it will increase the cost of living of every person at least 25 percent.

What about the interests of these persons? What are they going to say? What kind of an appeal can any opponent of any man who votes for this measure make to such per-

This bill particularly discriminates against those with large families to support

The pending bill, in addition to providing for a supersales tax—a transaction tax—is also a surtax. It is imposed upon taxes that already exist to pay $200 a month to 10,000,000 persons and require the raising of at least $24,000,000,000. Is there any Member of this body who feels that can be done?

The tax will have a bad effect upon the standards of living of small-income groups, which constitute the greater part of our people. It will sharply lower the already low standard of living that exists as a result of the trying conditions that confront us and which the depression has brought about.

The passage of this bill will sharply reduce the effective purchasing power of wages.

I voted for old-age assistance legislation in 1920 when I was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature. I can well claim credit for being one of those pioneers in Massachusetts who fought under the leadership of Wendell Thore of that State, for the passage of such necessary humane legislation.

I also fought for assistance to mothers in need; for children in need; for the needy blind, and for general relief in other directions. These deserving groups are also part of any humanitarian program. They are also a problem that we must solve. What about them? Under this law they will be penalized. The purchasing power of what little they get will be sharply reduced. Why should they not get the benefits of this bill if it will assure prosperity? If the formula of the pending bill is correct, why not make recovery quicker. an expansion of our national economy greater by paying everyone $200 a month? If paying 10,000,000 persons $200 a month will assure prosperity and an expansion of national economy, paying 130,000,000 persons $200 a month will assure greater prosperity, if the economic policies upon which this bill are based are correct. The passage of this bill will result in irreparable harm to agriculture. The farmer will have to pay the transaction tax. In that respect he is a producer-he pays at the source. That being so, and as experience tells us, he will have to absorb the tax of most of his transactions and yet, he is also a consumer. When he buys he pays all of the transaction taxes imposed on the article he purchases. How long do you think he can stand that kind of business?

A vote for this bill will be a vote against the best interests of the farmer. Any opponent of any man who votes for this bill who represents an agricultural district can well claim that he voted to destroy the agricultural activities of this country.

The passage of this bill will destroy business—the small, the moderate, and the independent businesses and businessmen of this country. It will create intense monopoly. It will increase unemployment.

Dr. Townsend admitted in testifying before the Committee on Ways and Means that the passage of the pending bill will eliminate the middleman. He also said that the middleman "was incompetent" and was "an unnecessary appendage to our economic system." Do you agree with Dr. Townsend? Do you think the average businessman and the worker, the person employed by such businessmen, agree with Dr. Townsend? Do you think that the middleman and the average businessman should be destroyed? Dr. Townsend admits that they will be destroyed if this bill becomes a law.

What do you think these businessmen and their employees will say when they realize the significance of the vote of a Member of this body who represents their district? A powerful argument an opponent could make on any Member on this and other grounds who might vote for this bill.

Dr. Townsend admitted that the effect of this bill would be to squeeze out the middleman, and a large financial group, in order to avoid the payment of the transaction tax, would buy direct from the producer and sell direct to the consumer. That means intense monopoly in addition to destroying the average business of this country. It must be borne in mind that we have 1.600,000 retail stores in this country alone, employing over 4,000,000 employees, and that is only a part of our small, moderate, and independent businesses of our country. It is estimated that such businesses employ anywhere from ten to twelve millions of persons.

The passage of this bill will give to foreign imports an advantage over American products. Certainly any fabricated article imported into the United States would not pay the transaction taxes abroad. Competitive articles produced or manufactured in the United States would pay the transaction taxes in the United States. That means foreign products have a tremendous advantage over American products.

Our foreign trade would be practically destroyed, if not destroyed; American produced and manufactured goods sold abroad would be subjected to the transaction taxes while in the process of fabrication or manufacture. How could such goods compete in the markets of the world with goods produced or manufactured in other countries which are not subjected to the same type of taxation? Common sense tells us that our foreign trade would be destroyed.

Dr. Townsend first introduced H. R. 2. The pending bill is a repudiation of H. R. 2 and the hope and aspiration of those who have been led to believe that they will receive $200 a month and at the same time bring about recovery.

Dr. Townsend, in the hearings, said that any Member of Congress whom he had supported who voted for any bill other than H. R. 2 would be doing an act that would result in Dr. Townsend's opposition.

He now says that any Member who advocates H. R. 2 will receive his opposition. What more evidence of attempted control or ownership of conscience and vote of a duly elected representative of the people do we want than that?

You must vote for what I say, right or wrong, says Dr. Townsend. I can change my mind, says the good doctor, but no one else can without incurring my displeasure. I have clubs in your district; the members bow to my will; they will accept what I tell them-until they wake up-and through them I put fear into the minds of legislators so that they will bow to my will. That is what Dr. Townsend actually means; but there are other persons living in congressional districts, and I wonder what they are going to say when they find out that their Member of the House, if he does, bowed to such expediency. I wonder what the small and the independent businessman will say when he realizes that a vote was cast to drive him out of business. I wonder what his employees will say when they realize a vote was passed the effect of which would result in their losing their jobs. I wonder what the farmer will say when he realizes the meaning and the effect of this bill.

I wonder if it is realized and appreciated that if this bill becomes a law it will impose a tax that will not only seriously interfere with business and agriculture and all other walks of business activity, decreased purchasing power, but will also seriously affect religious, educational, and charitable institu-

I wonder what the dependent blind, the dependent children—although they have no vote now—dependent mothers, and other general relief cases will say when they see what they receive, the little that they do receive, reduced in purchasing power to 25 percent.

I wonder what the veterans of the country will say who are receiving a pension for their service to our country in case of war, and to those veterans who are receiving compensation for a service-connected condition, when they realize, as they will, that a vote for this bill is a vote to sharply reduce the purchasing power of the pension or compensation that they receive from the Government.

I wonder what all persons employed will say when they realize that a vote for this bill is a vote to sharply increase the cost of living, at least 25 percent, thereby reducing in purchasing power the wages that they receive.

Yes; I wonder what the very persons who are sincerely but erroneously asking for the passage of this bill will say when they see it later on from a common-sense angle. What they will think and do to the very ones whom they elected to represent them in a constructive and fearless manner and who voted for a bill that would injure the aged, destroy small and independent businessmen, reduce purchasing power, increase unemployment, adversely affect the farmer, and result in chaos.

Every real American opposes dictatorships of all kinds. The passage of this bill would result in an economic dictatorshipthe control of all businesses by a few; the small and independent businessman, employing millions throughout the country, being squeezed out. That would result in economic dictatorship, and we cannot have such a condition existing without government itself being affected.

I respect the views of the persons who are advocating this plan. However, I cannot allow my respect for them to cause me, because of the fear of votes, to do something that I know is wrong, and which I know would be disastrous to the welfare of our country and to our people.

Until the present administration came into power very little, if anything, was done throughout the country for the aged. The Social Security Act, recommended by President Roosevelt, created a national pattern for relief for the dependent aged, the dependent blind, and dependent children. Today, 48 States and 3 Territories have old-age assistance laws, and the Federal Government is contributing toward the payment of the pensions paid. Whether the Federal Government's contributions should be larger is a question that is open to fair debate. Personally, I feel that the Federal Government could and should make a larger contribution. In over 40 States we have legislation making payments to the needy blind and to the needy dependent children. Prior to the passage of the Social Security Act very few States of the Union made provision for payments for either the aged and blind or for deserving children. Whatever improvements among these three groups should be made, should be done through amendments to the Social Security Act, and through a Federal-State program.

If the present bill passes it would wipe away State responsibility and would completely give to the Federal Government the duty and responsibility of paying all pensions and of making all investigations and all supervision of such a national plan. That means that assistance and supervision would be directed from Washington. That means the creating of a bureaucracy that would be harmful to our country. That means investigators from one section of the country, directed from Washington, going into other sections of the country, into the family life of the aged, and investigating their family life and supervising their family life. That is contrary to every instinct of sound government and to everything which is consistent with the best interests of the individual and in the individual preserving his or her dignity and personality. I do not want the people of Massachusetts to be governed from Washington in such a manner. The only way that that can be stopped is by State participation.

The passage of this bill will not produce the results desired. The promise is held forth of a payment of $200 a month. The tax provided in the within bill will not produce anywhere near that amount. However, the taxes provided for in this bill, as I have stated before, will result in economic chaos, and a stagnation of business and a decreased national income, and decreased revenues that will temporarily, at least, result in a condition that will probably suspend all payments for relief purposes not only to the aged, not only to the general relief cases, but to the blind and to the dependent children.

For any Member of this body who is considering voting for this bill based upon expediency and looking at it from a long-term angle, and having in mind a year from next fall, the correct vote, in addition to being the sound vote to make, is to vote against the bill.

This bill should be overwhelmingly defeated. [Applause.] The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired.

Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Smith of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6466) to provide for and promote the general welfare of the United States by supplying to the people a more liberal distribution and increase of purchasing power, retiring certain citizens from gainful employment, improving and stabilizing gainful employment for other citizens, stimulating agricultural and industrial production and general business, and alleviating the hazards and insecurity of old age and unemployment; to provide a method whereby citizens shall contribute to the purchase of and receive a retirement annuity; to provide for the raising of the necessary revenue to operate a continuing plan therefor; to provide for the appropriation and expenditure of such revenue; to provide for the proper administration of this act; to provide penalties for violation of the act; and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 205, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Massachusets opposed to the bill?

Mr. TREADWAY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TREADWAY moves to recommit the bill H. R. 6466 to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to that committee to report back to the House after due consideration a bill which, in the judgment of the committee, is constitutional and will provide a just, equitable, and sufficient pension for old people, based upon the new assessment the pay-as-you-go principle.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question will be considered as ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and navs

The yeas and nays were ordered.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include therein a letter and the address referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER]?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

I am pleased to send herewith a copy of Bishop Ireton's sermon, which was delivered at Arlington Cemetery on May 28, as part of the solemn memorial military field Mass, the first of its kind ever to be held in the Amphitheater. The Mass was sponsored by the Knights of Columbus and 42 Catholic societies of the District.

I need not tell you how deeply pleased we were to have you with us last Sunday and what an honor it was to have you in the line of march.

The address of Bishop Ireton referred to follows:

ADDRESS OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE MOST REVEREND PETER L. IRETON, COADJUTOR BISHOP OF RICHMOND

Less than 3 years after the close of the War between the States, a small party from the North visited some of the cemeteries and recent battlefields in the vicinity of Richmond. At a burial and recen't battlefields in the vicinity of Richmond. At a burial ground near Petersburg they were struck by the presence of faded Confederate flags and withered flowers, which met their eye from every soldier's grave; silent testimony to the grief and affection of loving survivors for those who had fought so bravely and had gone. In this northern group was the wife of General Logan, commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. On her return to Washington, her recital of this feature, which more than anything else had impressed itself upon her, caught the heart and the imagination of the general. In consequence, he issued general orders No. 11 under date of May 5, 1868. From that message we select the following:

"We should guard their graves with sacred vigilance. All that the consecrated wealth and faith of the Nation can add to their adornment and security is but a fitting tribute to the memory of her slain defenders. Let no wanton foot tread rudely on such hallowed ground. Let pleasant paths invite the coming and going of reverent visitors and fond mourners. Let no vandalism of avarice or neglect, no ravages of time testify to the present or the coming generations that we have forgotten as a people the cost of a free and undivided republic."

Today, we obey that order.

We assemble around this altar of sacrifice; we offer what to the Catholic, what in reality is the highest prayer given by God

We assemble around this altar of sacrifice; we offer what to the Catholic, what in reality is the highest prayer given by God to men, to offer, a holy sacrifice, a clean oblation; the renewal, the continuance, the re-presentation of the sacrifice of the God-Man upon the cross, when He laid down His life for friend and for enemy. Mindful of the love that Christ Jesus had for His native land; mindful of His lament over the Jerusalem He loved and which He foreknew would reject Him, we offer to Him our thanksgiving that we have been born into or have been adopted by a free America. In union with Himself, in union with one another, we offer to Him today our gratitude, our loving gratitude, for the souls of these patriots, nearly forty thousand, buried in this hallowed spot—soldiers, sailors, marines, men from every tribe and race. We recall to Christ His own words, "Greater love than this no man hath that a man lay down his own life for his friend." And these men, great or small, officer or private, gave their all, laid down their lives for their country, that its institutions and its liberty be preserved. These with the other tens and tens of thousands buried in a thousand graveyards which dot America or in down their lives for their country, that its institutions and its liberty be preserved. These with the other tens and tens of thousands buried in a thousand graveyards which dot America or in foreign lands, or who have found the bosom of the ocean their last resting place, died that this Government of free men might persevere; that it might not perish from the earth. The offering was theirs—the reward is theirs.

One hundred and fifty years ago the Constitution of free men in these free States came into being. Amended from time to time, according to the wisdom of her citizenry, according to new conditions and new demands, basically it has remained the charter of the Republic. And oh, if only every citizen of these States, every resident, every emigrant had lived up to that ideal. One hundred and fifty years ago, too, on yonder Georgetown hill across the Potomac, there was founded a college, whose basic principle was and has been, as has all Catholic education, the injunction of Christ, "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, but to God the things that are God's." And oh, too, if every Catholic in these United States had lived up completely to that ideal, yea, more than an ideal, to the demand of the founder of the church, how much deeper would have been Christian influence on the life of the Republic. It was the thought and the pronouncement of Franklin Roosevelt, that religion must be the basis of true democracy. Had these principles of religion, had the principles underlying the Constitution been permitted to find complete lodgment in the soul of every American, we should not be here today; there would be no room, no occasion for a Memorial Day. Of it there were, it would be to memorialize soldiers of peace and not of war. Men do not hate one another naturally. Hate is the outgrowth of avarice, of lust for power, of ambition to rule in the individual or in the group. And hate means forgetfulness of God and of the responsibility of citizenship. War is God's permissive visitation on the sons of men. War

Neither should we be here today if certain teachings which emanate frequently from too many university chairs, which find expression in book after book, in magazine after magazine, were true; teachings that would control the minds of men and sway the destiny of nations.

If the bodies of the lowly or the mighty crumbled into dust beneath this Arlington sod were all, if these soldiers and sailors had been but cogs in the machinery of a mechanistic universe, if we are but the slaves or creatures of a despot state, the duped and we are but the slaves or creatures of a despot state, the duped and unresisting pawns of absolutism or racism, we would not be here. Two hundred years ago, in a period of rampant unbelief, a great French preacher wrote: "If we wholly perish with the body, what an imposture is this whole system of laws, manners, and usages on which human society is founded. If we wholly perish with the body, these maxims of charity, patience, justice, honor, gratitude, and friendship, which sages have taught and good men practiced, what are they but empty words, possessing no real or binding efficacy?

"Why should we heed them if in this life only we have hope? "Why should we heed them if in this life only we have hope? Think not of duty. What can we owe to the dead, to the living, to ourselves, if all are, or will be, nothing. Think not of morality; it is a mere chimera, a bugbear of human invention, if retribution ends with the grave. If we must wholly perish, then is obedience to the law but foolish slavery. Justice is an unwarrantable infringement upon the liberty of man, an imposition, a usurpation. The law of marriage is a vain scruple. Modesty is a prejudice; bonor and probity such stuff as dreams are made of. And incest, murder, parricide, the most heartless cruelties and the blackest crimes, are but the legitimate sport of man's irresponsible nature. Accept the boasted philosophy of unbelievers, accept their maxims, and the whole world falls back into a frightful chaos. The government of states and nations has not longer any cement to uphold them. The human race is no more than an assemblage of reckless barbarians, shameless, remorseless, brutal, denaturalized, with no other law than force, no other check than passion, no other bond than irreligion, no other God than self."

One may read in an ancient Roman graveyard from imperial pagen days the epitaph, "I was not and I became, I was and I am not." What a contrast with the faith indicated here on the temb of the Unknown Soldier: "Here rests in honored glory an American soldier known but to God."

Yes, our testimony is in the Christian tomb, "He is risen, he is not here." His soul goes marching on. We memorialize the dead because of that belief. A memorial day for a nation of atheists, if such there could be, for a society of the godless is a contradiction in terms. Man is God's creature, His greatest creature, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels; Thou hast crowned him with glory and honor and hast set him over the works of Thy hands. Thou hast subjected all things under his feet" (Hebrews, hands. Thou hast subjected all things under his feet" (Hebrews, xi: 2-7). Man's soul made in the image of God is a spiritual substance. He is individualized; he is a person and therefore a center of responsibility, with the obligation to know God, to love God; and only in the pursuit of virtue and in the fulfilling of what he learns to be the will of God can he work out his destiny. Let the radical whose prating would destroy both the earthly happiness of the individual, as well as his immortal soul, fulminate that religion is a delusion, a soporific, an opiate. But the Christian knows that God has created man incorruptible; after the image of His own likeness and with the prophet he proclaims his belief, "I said in my heart God shall judge both the just and the wicked and there shall be the time for the reestablishment of all things."

Therefore are we gathered around this altar of sacrifice in earthly memory of those who have gone before, in anticipation of union

If these bodies could be reanimated to stand at attention upon their graves, what would be their message to us as children of God? What would be their message to their fellow citizens? What would be their message to their fellow soldiers—to all the nations of the world? Their message to each might be, "As you are, so once were we; as we are, so one day you shall be." Remember that thou art dust, and unto dust thou shalt return. But this is not spoken of the soul. No; their salute would be the American soldier's salute in mutual respect from equal to equal, no matter the difference in rank. It would be the outstretched open hand of comradeship and fellow-ship in the bond of a common human and eternal destiny.

They would bid us hearken to the counsel of a Washington, a Jefferson, a Monroe. That as our ancestors came from an old land of persecution, of mutual strife among the nations, in search of a new land of freedom and equality, that we should seek to preserve with all our might the dearest of earthly possession. These serried ranks of the risen dead would bid us remember the words from the person of Robert E. Lee when he had declined the comment of the pen of Robert E. Lee when he had declined the command of the armies of the North: "I shall return to my native State, and, save in defense, shall draw my sword no more." They would bid us all remember in their clear light of the eternal day, unaffected by the distracting considerations of time, the law of God, that only in a text way does hill response to hear words.

distracting considerations of time, the law of God, that only in a just war does killing cease to be murder.

God grant that as a result of this year's Memorial Day observance there may be increasingly forced upon the mind of all the conviction that America's first need, the world's first need, is a return to God. Such conversion is not a mass movement; it cannot be effected by country-wide propaganda; it is an individual obligation in face of time, in face of eternity.

Unfortunately America has gone far afield from the path, the straight and narrow path mentioned by Christ as the road that

Only in complete surrender to a God of purity, of justice, of mercy, of charity have we the right to hope that the scourge of war now or in the future be averted from us, from our children, from our children's children.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Arends, has been unavoidably detained. Had he been present, he would have voted "nay" on the passage of the Townsend bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit two requests: First, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record in regard to the vote on the Townsend bill, and second, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein a radio address I delivered over station WDGY on May 30.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record by printing a speech I delivered on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REORGANIZATION PLANS I AND II

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Select Committee on Government Organization, I call up the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 138) providing that reorganization plans numbered I and II shall take effect July 1, 1939.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of reorganization plan No. I. submitted to the Congress on April 25, 1939, and the provisions of reorganization plan No. II, submitted to the Congress on May 9, 1939, shall take effect on July 1, 1939, notwithstanding the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

With the following committee amendment:

"Sec. 2. Nothing in such plans or this joint resolution shall be construed as having the effect of continuing any agency or function beyond the time when it would have terminated without regard to such plans or this joint resolution or of continuing any function beyond the time when the agency in which it was vested would have terminated without regard to such plans or this joint resolution."

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this joint resolution is to set a definite date when reorganization plans Nos. I and II shall go into effect. We seek to simplify the accounting procedure. By setting the date as of July 1, the first day of the fiscal year, a great deal of trouble will be avoided. If this action is not taken, then under plan No. I a hundred separate accounts must be set up on June 26, and changed again on July 1, the start of the fiscal year. Under plan No. II the present accounts would continue until July 8, and in 8 days new accounts would be necessary.

While some of us felt that the amendment adopted unanimously by the committee, now section 2 of the resolution, is absolutely unnecessary, still to make certain that there is nothing in this joint resolution or in one of the Executive orders that would continue a temporary agency or its function beyond the date set by law a provision was added so stating.

There is no disagreement among the members of your select committee on this resolution as amended. Its adoption will conclude reorganization for this session. When we return here in January the plans provided in this resolution will have been in operation for 6 months. The appropriations for the next fiscal year will be transferred along with the various agencies. In many instances the money has already been allocated. It is hard to predict what savings will result, but we all hope that by consolidating functions a neat sum will remain unexpended at the end of the next fiscal year that will revert to the Treasury.

It must be admitted that the Congress so restricted the President that he was unable to go as far as he would have liked in abolishing agencies and functions. As time goes on I am sure the people will realize the wisdom of granting the power to the President to improve the efficiency of the executive branch and they will look forward to the new orders he has promised to submit to the Congress in January. Reorganization is too important to be done overnight, but between now and the first of the year ample time will have passed to enable the President to make sound recommendations; and if plans I and II are successful, which I am sure they will be, then Congress will voice its immediate approval. In transferring the Bureau of the Budget and the Central Statistical Board so that it will be under his control, the President has the tools to do an excellent job on reorganization. The new set-up in the Budget worked out by former Acting Director Daniel Bell, for which we appropriated money in the Treasury appropriation bill, will enable that plan to go into effect July 1. With that investigating unit constantly on the job, and with the aid of the Statistical Board, information of great value should be gathered and placed before the President within the next few months. We now have an organization that will be able to locate overlapping and duplication. Had the Congress taken advantage of the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, that unit could have been in operation all these years; but it remained for Mr. Bell to show the Appropriations Committee its value; and when he did, the necessary funds to carry on were cheerfully granted. The President should set this new organization to work for him immediately after July 1.

Mr. Speaker, as I said before, your committee is in complete agreement, and if no time is desired by other Members, I shall move the previous question.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the committee amendment and the joint resolution to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ACQUISITION OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 572) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 572) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Section 2 of the Senate bill authorized the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, acting jointly through the agency of the Army and Navy Munitions Board, to determine which ma-terials are strategic and critical and to determine the quality and quantities of such materials to be purchased with sums appro-priated for that purpose. The House amendment adds the name of the Secretary of the Interior to those of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. The conference agreement adopts the House provision.

Section 3 of the Senate bill authorized the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, when they deem such action appropriate "because the domestic supply of any of the above materials is insufficient to meet the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country," to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to make purchases of such materials. The House amendment did not include the quoted language. The conference agreement retains the language of the Senate bill but adds the words "production or" before the word "supply." Section 3 of the Senate bill also required that the Secretary of the Treasury should include in his annual report a statement of the expenditures made and the methods employed for the rotation of materials which must be rotated to prevent deterioration. The materials which must be rotated to prevent deterioration. The House amendment did not include any such provision. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision.

Section 4 of the Senate bill provided that materials acquired under the bill might be used only in time of war, when a national emergency exists with respect to national defense as a consequence of the threat of war, or when the President issues a proclamation that a state of emergency exists arising out of deficiencies in the supplies of such materials. The Senate bill also provided that the President might sell any such materials upon finding that the quantity in possession is too large or not needed to carry out the provisions of the bill. The House amendment provided for use of such materials only in time of war or when a national emergency exists with respect to national defense as a result of the threat of war. The conference agreement adopts the language of the House The conference agreement adopts the language of the House amendment.

Section 5 of the Senate bill provided that purchases under the bill should be made in accordance with the provisions of the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933, and provided for allowing a reasonable time, not to exceed 1 year, for production and delivery from domestic sources. The Senate bill also provided that vendors of materials which have not been developed commercially in the light of the second of the provided by the properties. United States but which are available here might be exempted from the requirement of giving bond. The corresponding provision of the House amendment provided for the making of purchases in accordance with the provisions of the Buy American Act but did not restrict the reasonable time allowable for production and delivery from domestic sources or permit the exemption of vendors from the requirement of giving bond. The conference agreement adopts the language of the Senate bill.

seriement adopts the language of the Senate bill.

Section 6 of the Senate bill authorized the appropriation of $10.000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1943, for the purpose of procuring, maintaining, transporting, rotating, and storing materials to be acquired under the bill. The corresponding provisions of the House amendment, which were in section 5 thereof, authorized the appropriation of $100,000,000 during the period of the fiscal years June 30, 1939, to and including June 30, 1943, to be expended for the same purpose. The House amendment also made available for the same pose. The House amendment also made available for the same purpose all customs duties on any such materials. The conference agreement adopts the provisions of the House amendment with respect to the amount authorized to be appropriated and the time when it may be appropriated but does not make the customs duties considering of activities of activitie duties available for expenditure for the acquisition of additional materials.

Section 6 of the House amendment provided that the agency Section 6 of the House amendment provided that the agency charged with the acquisition of the materials should request the appropriate department or departments to undertake the acquisition of such materials from (1) those nations which are indebted to the United States and would agree to credit the purchase price against the principal of such indebtedness and (2) those nations which would consent to barter such materials for surplus agricultural commodities produced in the United States. There was no corresponding provision in the Senate bill. The conference agreement omits this provision of the House amendment.

Section 7 of the Senate bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, through the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the

Section 7 of the Senate bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, through the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the Director of the Geological Survey, to make investigations with respect to the development, mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of domestic mineral resources which are essential to the "industrial needs of the United States for common defense." The House amendment authorized such investigations with respect to mineral resources which are essential to the "national defense or the industrial needs of the United States." The conference agree-ment provides for such investigations with respect to mineral resources which are essential to the "common defense or the indus-trial needs of the United States."

A. J. MAY. EWING THOMASON. CHAS. I. FADDIS. CHARLES R. CLASON. THOS. E. MARTIN.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot sit silent and permit the conference report to be agreed to without expressing my regret and entering my protest against the action of the House conferees in permitting the conferees on the part of the other body to strike from the House bill a paragraph which had practically the unanimous approval of the Members of the House.

This bill proposes an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing strategic war materials. The House bill carried a provision that the agency charged with the purchase of these materials should in their negotiations try to do two things: First, to purchase the materials from those nations which are indebted to the United States and undertake to credit the purchase price against such debts. You, of course, are aware of the fact that the nations which produce these materials now owe us in excess of $12,000,-000,000. The other provision was to the effect that in their negotiations they should purchase these materials by exchanging for them surplus agricultural commodities.

The purpose on the part of the House committee and on the part of the House, I am sure, in approving these two provisions was to try to do two things, to save the United States Treasury this appropriation of $100,000,000 at this time when we are in bad need of funds, and to find a market for our excess agricultural commodities.

Of course, I shall not undertake to resist the conference report, but I did feel compelled to take this opportunity to register in this way my protest against the striking of these two provisions from the bill.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. What was the objection of the conferees to the feature of the bill which the gentleman has so clearly pointed out and which the House so enthusiastically adopted?

Mr. PACE. Frankly, I have not been able to learn the real objection on the part of the conferees unless it was that they just wanted to make an outright purchase of these materials in cash, assuming that our national debt is not quite large enough.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Certainly; I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MAY. I would like to explain to the gentleman from Georgia and to the membership of the House that in the discussion of the matter about which the gentleman has just spcken in the conference, serious questions were raised by some of the Senators with respect to the treaty obligations of the United States and, particularly, provisions of our treaties relating to the war debts, and it was feared by the Senators, and we were convinced in the end, if we included such a provision, it might lead to complications and probably lead to avoidance of the debts that the debtor nations owe us. For this reason we consented, although unwillingly, to the elimination of the matter from the conference report.

Mr. PACE. With respect to the statement made by the chairman of the committee, of course, it might have been necessary in some way to have modified the terms of some debt agreement, but the gentleman will recall that the status now is that they do not pay us anything and I think a modification to the extent of securing credit for $100,000,-000 would be worth while, and I regret the conferees were not willing to undertake that task. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a statement I made before the Commerce Committee of the Senate with reference to the Clarks Hill Dam project.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

MAJOR OVERHAULS FOR CERTAIN NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 6065) to authorize major overhauls for certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will be pleased to explain the bill, but does the gentleman want me to make the explanation before the consent is granted?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Which one of the bills is this?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This is the bill with reference to reconditioning five battleships.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman should give the explanation now.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes an expenditure of $6,660,000 for the purpose of reconditioning five battleships. The character of the modernization or the reconditioning is strictly engineering and is of a somewhat secret nature and the report does not disclose the character of the overhaul or modernization.

Under the law we are permitted to have ships reconditioned at a cost not exceeding each year $450,000 per ship without any additional authority from the Congress having already been obtained. Whenever the expenditure is over $450,000 on one vessel it is necessary to come to the Congress and get permission to do so. This expenditure will be made over a period of 18 months, and the cost on each one of these ships is about $1,200,000. They are the ships Tennessee, California, Colorado, Maryland, and West Virginia.

This is recommended by the Budget and unanimously reported by the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Is this one of the bills for which a rule was recently voted by the Rules Committee?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The Rules Committee has given a rule for the consideration of this bill, but I am asking unanimous consent to see if we can dispense with taking up the time of the House in the adoption of a rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And there was no opposition in the Rules Committee?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No opposition to the rule and no opposition to the bill in committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of effecting major overhauls of the U. S. S. Tennessee, California, Colorado, Maryland, and West Virginia alterations and repairs to such vessels are hereby authorized and expenditures therefor shall not be limited by the provisions of the act approved July 18, 1935 (49 Stat. 482; 5 U. S. C. 468a), but the total cost of such alterations and repairs shall not exceed $6,660,000 for all five vessels, in addition to $450,000 per vessel for each period of 18 consecutive months.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

House Resolution 185 was also laid on the table.

WARRANT AND COMMISSIONED WARRANT OFFICERS IN THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6044) to regulate the number of warrant and commissioned warrant officers of the Marine Corps, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of warrant and commissioned warrant officers in the Marine Corps and their distribution in the warrant and commissioned warrant grades shall be as the President may from time to time deem necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Does this bill increase the number of warrant officers in the Marine Corps?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It does not. It permits the President to designate, in accordance with the law in respect to the Navy and in accordance to the law in respect to the Army, the number of warrant officers. As the law is today it is fixed by statute, and this does away with the positiveness of the number of warrant officers. Of course he could probably increase them.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. All this bill does is to provide the same method for determining the number of warrant officers for the Marine Corps as now obtains for the Navy. It probably will from time to time result in some increases, because of the increased mechanization and therefore the increase, necessarily, of technicians.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This bill is submitted to the House by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Maas], the ranking minority member on the committee, and is the unanimous report of the committee. It is a departmental bill. I read from the report:

The number of warrant officers authorized by present law for the Marine Corps is 146, which includes 4 additional numbers who will not be replaced when they leave the active list, leaving the permanent authorized number at 142. Of these, 50 are chief marine gunners and marine gunners, 50 are chief quartermaster clerks and quartermaster clerks, and 42 are chief pay clerks and pay clerks. These numbers were fixed during the World War period, over 20 years ago. Since that time, the marked developments in such specialties as aviation and antiaircraft defense, radio communications, tanks, motor transport, and the like, have emphasized the need of a more adequate warrant personnel in the Marine Corps, comparable to that possessed by the Navy, to occupy positions of responsibility calling for extensive special technical knowledge and training.

In the Navy, warrant officers generally are authorized in such numbers as the President may from time to time deem necessary. This provision is sufficiently flexible to make it possible to meet the needs of the Navy in warrant officers at any time without additional legislation, and at the same time permits the Congress to control the actual numbers through annual appropriations. The Marine Corps is a part of the naval service and, under existing law, its commissioned and enlisted strength would be proportionately increased along with any increase of commissioned and enlisted strength of the Navy.

The committee feels that this principle is correct, since the personnel needs of the Marine Corps increase in about the same proportion as those of the Navy, and the proposed bill would put the warrant personnel of the corps on a similar basis.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, does this bill make any change in the pay of the warrant officers?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It does not. It permits flexibility only. It permits the President to have the same discretion he has today under the law with reference to the Army and the Navy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it the purpose, so far as the gentleman knows, of the Navy Department to continue to advocate that warrant officers shall be a permanent element in the Marine Establishment?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, they are part and parcel of it. The warrant officer is just as much a part of it as the sergeant of the Army. He is an officer without being a commissioned officer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He stands between the noncommissioned officer of the highest grade and a commissioned officer?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct. Of course, you have to have them, because you must have a top officer above the enlisted man up to the commissioned officer. In other words, as the gentleman knows, a warrant officer in the Marine Corps and the Navy occupies an identical position to that of the sergeant in the Army as far as the control of companies is concerned and certain character of work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot quite agree with that last observation

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This bill is a departmental bill and was presented by Mr. MAAS, the ranking member of the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Did I understand the gentleman from Georgia to indicate that the passage of this bill will give the President authority to increase the number of field clerks and quartermasters' clerks and cause an additional drain on an overburdened Treasury?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; there will be no additional drain on an overburdened Treasury at all. It merely permits flexibility in naming the number of warrant officers. It puts the matter in exactly the same category as the Army and the Navy, and the Marine Corps is a branch of the Navy.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. This bill comes out of the committee with a unanimous recommendation?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is a departmental bill, sent to the Speaker, and I referred it to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Maas], who looks after that branch of the committee work, and after a full hearing the committee unanimously recommended that the Maas bill be enacted.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection on that statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

House Resolution 184 was laid on the table.

PRIVILEGE OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question of Mr. HOFFMAN. In connection with that, I have a resolution, which I will send to the desk, which contains a statement of that question of privilege, and time will be saved if the Clerk will read the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Hoffman submits the following resolution:

"House Resolution 208

"Whereas on Wednesday, May 31, after the House had resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6466, and was in session in the Committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] was recognized by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and addressed the House, and, while addressing the House, made a statement, the exact words of which I cannot now recall, and the reports of which are not available to me and which remarks to which reference is now being made weaper without in the Present but which in out. being made were not printed in the Record but which, in substance and effect, intimated that in the future the action of the Ways and Means Committee of the House on the bill which was then under discussion would be regarded as puslllanimous; and "Whereas the word "puslllanimous" is defined by the Funk & tleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] was not in order and demanded that the words so uttered be taken down; and words were taken down, reported to the House, and a ruling made by the Speaker, and the point of order sustained; and the RECORD, under date of May 31, 1939, the following now appears:

"'Mr. Massingale. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to delete from the RECORD, or have it done, any reference
I made in the colloquy in my remarks this afternoon concerning the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes]. I think I got that permission in the Committee, but some seem to understand not.

"Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, for the moment I object because I understand the gentleman remarked that he would get the head-

thing he does not know anything about.
"'Mr. Hoffman. I am not, and I object.

"The Speaker. The Chair is under the impression that the gentleman from Oklahoma has obtained unanimous consent to withdraw the remarks.

"'Mr. Massingale. I thought I obtained it, but in talking with "'Mr. MASSINGALE. I thought I obtained it, but in talking with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], he thought I did not.

"Whereas there also appears in the RECORD of May 31, 1939, in the left-hand column of page 6465, the following:

"'Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings under which the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale], in reference to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes], were taken down may be deleted from the Record and that the gentleman from Oklahoma may have the right to revise and extend his remarks'; and

"Whereas a question involving the integrity of the House itself and of the Record of the House is now raised and the Record as it stands is not a true transcript of what occurred on the floor of the House; and

"Whereas the RECORD of the House, as now printed, is not a true and correct record of the proceedings of the House, insofar as the and correct record of the proceedings of the House, insofar as the same relate to the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma as to the action of the Ways and Means Committee, as to the making of a point of order thereon, and as to the ruling of the Speaker thereon: Now, therefore, be it "Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker of the House, or, in the discretion of the Speaker, make reference to a standing committee of the House, to ascertain from the reporters of the House and from such other sources as they may deem trustworthy a true and correct record of what did occur, deleting from such record all such matters which the gentleman from Oklahoma, [Mr. MASSINGALE] was given permission to delete from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] was given permission to delete, and retaining in the Record all such other transactions and proceedings which occurred on the floor of the House and for the withdrawal of which permission was not given; and thereupon to report its conclusions to the House, together with such recom-mendations as it may deem desirable."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to enlarge on my statement, so that I may correctly show the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to extend his own remarks.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No, Mr. Speaker. I ask to state it now in addition to the question of privilege which the Clerk has read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may state his question of privilege.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the privilege of the House is involved in this respect, that while the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] obtained permission to withdraw and did withdraw what he had said with reference to another Member of the House, at no time did he obtain permission to withdraw what he said with reference to the committee. At no time did he obtain permission to withdraw the point of order that was made by the Member from Michigan-at no time did he obtain permission to withdraw the demand that his words with reference to the committee be taken down, and the Record as it stands today, as printed this morning, is nowhere a true record of what happened yesterday. If it be true that the RECORD of the House of Representatives is not a true record, is not in accord with the facts, then that is the point I would like to have determined, as to whether the RECORD shall stand or be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] did obtain unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Under the general practice of the House that gave to the gentleman from Oklahoma the right to withhold revision of his remarks from the RECORD. The Chair is of the opinion that the other subject matter stated in the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] probably does raise a question of the privileges of the House.

Is it the desire of the gentleman to have the resolution referred to a committee?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Either to a special committee or to any standing committee, in the discretion of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that in the opinion of the Chair the Committee on Rules would have jurisdiction over the resolution.

Is there objection to referring the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan to the Committee on Rules? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Wednesday, at the conclusion of the legislative matters for the day and any special orders that may have been entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include an article from the June issue of Sphere.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein a short editorial from the Washington Evening Star of last night.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman is granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House heretofore made the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Engel] is recognized.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not use the time today but ask unanimous consent that the special order granted me today may be transferred to Monday next. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Monday next after the disposition of the legislative calendar for the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FITZPATRICK, for continuous leave of absence for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

To Mr. Celler, for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. Coffee of Washington and Mr. Martin of Colorado asked and were given permission to extend their own remarks in the Recfed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes to make an announcement. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to say a few words about the program for tomorrow. There is only one matter that I know of to come up tomorrow, and that is consideration of a bill creating the office of Under Secretary of Commerce, for the consideration of which unanimous consent was granted the other day.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. When unanimous consent was granted to give that bill right-of-way without a rule, I understood the gentleman from Texas to say that the members of the committee would be given notice when it would be called up, and that time for general debate would be agreed upon. No one has since spoken to me about bringing the matter up. The minority members of the committee should have been notified.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will refresh his memory of what occurred earlier in the week, I think he will recall that I told him that in all probability the bill would come up on Thursday or Friday, and the gentleman from Michigan then requested that it be not called up on Thursday immediately after the vote on the so-called Townsend plan.

Mr. MAPES. There was a rather indefinite discussion such as the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. RAYBURN. I told the gentleman very definitely that I wanted to get the bill up either Thursday or Friday, and he said he would prefer that it were not called up on Thursday. I told him then that it would be called up on Friday.

Mr. MAPES. I have been anticipating that somebody would speak about time for debate and that we would know when to prepare definitely for it. No one has said anything to me about it since the rather indefinite discussion we had the other day.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the gentleman will remember I told him at that time that whatever time he and the gentleman from California would agree on would be entirely satisfactory to me. That is in the Record.

Mr. MAPES. I appreciate that; still I would like to state

Mr. MAPES. I appreciate that; still I would like to state at this point that I think Members of the majority who expect to call up bills and resolutions might very properly notify the minority Members of such intent without the minority Members having to run around and ask a dozen Members what business is coming up from day to day. That is all I care to say.

Mr. RAYBURN. Just a moment. The gentleman having said that, I desire to make a few remarks myself.

Mr. MAPES. Let me say that that does not apply at all to the majority leader.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that I told him on Monday of this week it was the intention to bring the bill up this week on Thursday or Friday. I made that statement to the gentleman from Michigan and told him that whatever time the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member agreed upon would be eminently satisfactory to me.

Mr. MAPES. Let me say again that my observation had no reference at all to the majority leader; but I also repeat that the chairman of the committee has said not a word to me with reference to bringing it up or about limitation of debate.

Mr. RAYBURN. And I repeat that whatever time the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from California agree upon will be satisfactory to me.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at two points in the Appendix of the Record by including two short addresses by Gen. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JUNE 2, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Spirit of Light, in this new dawn, lifting the shadows of darkness, let us hear Thy silent voice; do Thou impart Thy soul-giving strength. Looking to Thee, blessed Lord, may we not fail to realize that in this hurried, restless life Thou art ever ready to give guidance. Like Thy prophet of old, we pray for the riches of wisdom, that high duty and not selfish inclinations may determine our actions. In quiet and calm may we keep the ways of the great truths of life; we pray for pure hearts and contented spirits. Through labor, zeal, and resolute courage may we ever look forward for better things. Be merciful unto us, dear Father; give us our daily bread; feed our hearts, enrich our minds, and forgive us when we are blind to the common treasures of life. In our Saviour's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNITED STATES COTTON EXPORTS AGREEMENTS AND RECIPROCAL-TRADE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have here an article entitled "Exports of United States Cotton Hit 50-Year Low," dated New York, June 1, as follows:

EXPORTS OF UNITED STATES COTTON HIT 50-YEAR LOW

New York, June 1.—Exports of American cotton during April and the first 3 weeks of May, reported by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, were the smallest in more than 50 years.

Cotton experts attribute the low export movement partly to the price support derived from Government loans to growers in past seasons. This, they contend, has tended to impair the competitive position of the American fiber in world markets.

April exports of Egyptian cotton increased 48 percent over a year ago, whereas our shipments declined 53 percent. March exports from India were 23 percent greater than the same month last year.

Mr. Speaker, think of it, our exports of United States cotton have hit the lowest point in 50 years. Are the Members satisfied with the reciprocal-trade agreements that have been made, which are primarily responsible for this condition?

If we continue to permit Secretary Hull and the President of the United States to regulate our foreign commerce, then our cotton exports will be wiped out altogether. The power should lie in the Congress of the United States to regulate the American imports and exports, and unless the Congress does take action we are not going to help American farmers generally, and particularly the American cotton grower.

SPECIAL COMMISSION ON OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROUTZOHN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that I am now introducing a joint resolution calling for the creation of a special commission on old-age pensions which will have for its purpose and function the formulating of a national policy with respect to old-age pensions based upon the two general principles that payments should be made on a pay-as-you-go basis out of current revenues of the Government and should be adequate to provide a comfortable standard of living for the beneficiaries.

In my speech last Wednesday I stated my intention to introduce such a resolution after the anticipated defeat of H. R. 6466, then under consideration.

The salutary reasons for the adoption of this resolution are too numerous and obvious to require reference to all of them.

It cannot be gainsaid that the creation of such a commission will save the old-age pension problem from continuing to be a political football, a bone of contention for party strife, and will save the aged from exploitation.

Its creation will facilitate and expedite the enactment of a sound, constitutional, practical, and comforting old-age pension policy.

The thought back of this resolution is not new, so I have discovered since last Wednesday. Something similar was proposed by my colleague from New York, Mr. Hamilton Fish, 10 years ago. Had a commission been created then, it is safe to assert that we would have no old-age pension problem today.

My colleague, Mr. Bruce Barton, introduced in the last Congress a similar resolution pertaining to a proposed amendment to the Social Security Act.

Favorable action on his resolution probably would have obviated the experiences of Wednesday and the action Thursday.

Since discovering these similar measures I am convinced that others have had the same idea, all of which indicates that the resolution is worthy of earnest and sincere consideration.

Furthermore, I have been encouraged, advised, and requested to introduce the resolution by certain of my colleagues, as well as by constituents and others, including loyal Townsendites, who were informed of my intentions.

I therefore respectfully request that the committee to which this resolution will be referred give prompt attention and action to it. [Applause.]

DIES COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the Record. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Thorkelson]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, Wednesday, May 31, it was my pleasure to attend a session of the Dies Committee on Un-American Activities, and imagine my surprise when I found it to be a trial instead of an investigation. It was a trial of a patriotic citizen who did not have the benefit of counsel. I regret to make this statement, but the trial was, to say the least, extremely unfair.

General Moseley, with two Distinguished Service citations by Congress, was not permitted to present his evidence. I should say not. That might have exposed some of the higher Communists. He was instead instructed by the chairman to answer questions asked by a young interrogator, Mr. Whitley. As I listened to the testimony, I learned that General Moseley had evidently been "tailed," his mail opened, photographed, and that he had been "dictographed" as well. He had been treated to the same dose as a Member of Congress who had a dictograph placed in his room in the House Building—Evening Star, May 31.

Congress, of course, appropriated money to the Post Office Department to have snoopers open our mail and photograph it. We recently appropriated $300,000 to the F. B. I., which is evidently used to spy upon us, the people, and install dictographs in our offices, and I presume eventually in our homes. What a smell of the OGPU!

I suggest that the Dies committee investigate these Russian activities, for they are certainly not only un-American but in addition most foul and putrid, and, of course, a realistic and true picture of the Asiatic communism as practiced in those countries that subscribe to it.

Well, the whole procedure was a grand farce. The first day the questioner attempted to smear General Moseley and at the same time whitewash or protect the invisible government and "hoi polloi" in communism. No attempt was made to investigate the Communist. Certainly not. There is no reason for that, because there are too many of them, so they are too easy to find.

In the Evening Star, I note, "Fourteen persons arrested, blackjacks seized in auto strike." What of it? Nothing, except that a few days ago I quoted, in one of my talks before the House, a statement to the effect that the Communists voluntarily came out in support of the C. I. O. The author, Mr. Foster. This strike is going on in Detroit. Let the committee investigate who is behind that.

Are any of these strikes investigated by the Dies committee for un-American activities? No. Yet the Communist Party, in their own booklets, describe how the United States Government is to be transformed, and this prediction is within their reach if the American people remain in the same comatose condition they have been in for a number of years. The first plan in this great venture was to have the invisible government own and control all real money, and they are now holding $15,000,000,000 in gold certificates, and, of course, control our Nation's gold wealth. We have make-believe money, and I believe in Rochester, N. Y., if the papers are correct, the merchants are accepting blue and yellow chips for purchases. The Congress has appropriated millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money to have Federal snoopers in various departments open the mail, photograph it, spy on us, by dictographs in our rooms, and treat us like coolies. Of course, nothing I can say will change it because I realize very well that I am only 1 in 130,000,000 people, and that not one of the subsidized press would publish any part or parts of what I may say or write on un-American activities, when it is not to their interests. Let us not forget the Constitution of the United States is our fundamental law, which we swear to preserve, to protect and defend with our very lives. Anyone, no matter who the official may be, who departs from this obligation, is un-American, and those who subscribe to it are patriotic Americans, and do not make a mistake about that.

It is always the minority that begins destruction and, like a small leak in a dam, it gets larger and larger until the whole structure is washed away. This is happening to us today. We are a tolerant people, slow to be aroused, and we have failed to notice the danger from within. This failure is now apparent, and it is for that reason patriotic units are being organized throughout the Nation. organizations are creatures of necessity and represent a definite reaction to Government failure in eradicating subversive activities. No one is to blame for that but the Government itself, because officials therein have sworn to preserve, protect, and defend the people's rights, and when they fail to do so, the people themselves must, in order to preserve the Nation, stand forth in their own defense. If the American liberties and rights are not worth protection, if they are not worth fighting for, they are not worth having, and the people are firmly convinced that there is nothing better than the republican form of government we have always had. These patriotic organizations are not un-American, because they are born as a defense reaction against un-Americanism. They may, of course, become too zealous, and for that reason we find some of them acute patriots, or the zealous type, similar to those who enforced the old "blue laws," and no different from those who enforce religious laws too zealously, as was done during the inquisitions. Be that as it may, they are not inherently wrong, and they are certainly much preferable to the extreme left organization, which has for its only purpose the destruction of our Government, no matter whether it costs lives or not. So I say we must be fair, give and take on both sides, but above all let us stand today on the Constitution as it was given to us by the founders of our country—persons who were familiar with all sorts of unsound governments because they had lived in the midst of them, a people who, because of personal experiences, drafted an instrument for our protection, for the Nation's security, with a full measure of justice and protection even for the "un-American."

Un-American activities are those in conflict with the Constitution and began with the first unconstitutional law enacted by Congress. From the passing of such laws we now have the present un-American activities which are destroying our Nation today. We need not hunt for un-Americans, for they are here in Washington, if the committee has the slightest desire to find them. I realize, of course, that we are now faced with a different or changed government, in which the power lies entirely with the majority. The Members of the Senate and the House are all elected by this majority, and therefore its representatives, instead of representatives of their States. That is the great stumbling block in the administration of a republican form of government, for there is no direct State representation in Congress.

It is for this reason that I have said that we cannot go on as we are, for all governments must have a responsible regulatory body. This was the constitutional duty of Congress; but having capitulated to the White House crowd, a dictator will not only be born but a semidictator now sits in Washington, whether you believe it or not. Evidence of this is found on every hand, in the investigations of private citizens and in all those activities which I have already mentioned before in this talk. There is one thing left that may disturb this power today: Elect men to Congress who will assume their obligation with full responsibility, as set forth in the people's law and mandate, the Constitution of the United States.

General Moseley knows we have nothing to fear from our own people, but he also realizes that we have everything to fear from the invisible government whose members are disciples of Marxian philosophy. The danger is not entirely to be found in those who control this Government but is, instead, to be found in the method they use in employing subversive elements, or people to destroy and disseminate pernicious propaganda through their own publications. Socialism itself is not particularly dangerous, but socialism becomes destructive when it falls into the hands of vindictive and mercenary people. Let us now see how this works out.

Communism was bred in the byways and alleys of the world. I believe some of the early advocates of this philosophy in the United States lived in New York before they left for Russia to organize the government which is now ruling that nation. In this transformation of government there was no Christian spirit or kindness in their hearts. They killed, killed, and killed—innocent men, women, and children—until by sheer murder they emerged through a lake of blood into power. That is communism. Would we like that in the United States. I can hear 129,000,000 people say "no." After this communistic government gained control in Russia, they began their work, indirectly and directly, as planned by the invisible government—the international invisible government, if you please.

The next step was to sow the seeds of dissension, destroy patriotism, ridicule the patriots by foul and false propaganda, no different from that used today to besmear General Moseley in some of the daily papers. He did not say that he believed in nazi-ism, so called, which is a term that no one can define, not even the Dies committee itself. But the inquisitor, in his persecutory investigation, inferred that General Moseley was not a good American; and at this point I want to say that if General Moseley is not a sincere, patriotic American, there was not one in the room. I want to go a little further than that and say that I have not found anyone in the Army and Navy who is not a sound and stanch patriotic citizen.

Let us now continue analyzing communism. Being centered in Russia it immediately began to spread the poison from its fangs into such nations as tolerated communism. So the Communist invaded China and spread its poison there, to the destruction of the Chinese Empire. And do not forget, Russia has deprived China of northern Mongolia—a "brotherly" policy of communism. Communism then spread into Spain, fomented and created revolution, and in the process of that killed and destroyed lives without justification or common reason, except to promote its own nefarious practices. These are facts that we must remember when we fiirt with communism.

The same element has worked successfully in France and is keeping the French Government in a boiling condition because of its tolerance to socialism and the proponents of it.

The same thing happened in Austria when thousands of innocent lives were destroyed during the riots and liquidation when communism's own emissary was in power there.

This Communist element is also found in England and the leaders are well entrenched in high places there. We find the same condition in the United States with those in high command in top places directing the subversive activities within the United States. This condition is generally recognized and our people feel apprehensive over the Government's indifference to this menace. The same crowd controlled Germany at one time and promoted a destructive inflation, but they were discovered and kicked out for the general welfare of the German people and the safety and security of the German nation. That is all I am going to say about that, because I will now be called a Nazi by the Communist or the communistic servile press.

How is it possible to discover this breed bent upon destruction of the world for its own mercenary purposes? It is not hard, and if the intelligence service will spend its time investigating along the line I am now proposing it will find more evidence than it will in the mailing envelopes of our private citizens. The intelligence personnel subscribes to an obligation, and they must honor that. The service will not be respected until it protects the Nation and the people from subversive activities.

I shall now propose this, and in the proposal of it, mind you, I follow President Roosevelt's "good neighbor" policy, that he has advocated time and time again—the Golden Rule, "Do unto others as you would they would do unto you." That is the President's policy, and I am for it.

Let us take every organization that is anti-Russian and investigate the members of such organization, particularly to find out why they are anti-Russian. Let us then take the anti-Italians in the United States and find out why they are anti-Italians, and their reason for it. Let us take all the anti-Nazi or anti-German leagues and investigate their pet aversions and hatreds. In other words, let us call on the anti organizations with hatred toward other countries, have them up for investigation, and find out why they hate other countries, why they have gone directly contrary to our President's views, that of the "good neighbor" policy. He preaches the milk of human kindness, but he poisons the minds of our people toward such nations as he does not want to have milk.

The Dies committee may also find the names of a number of societies which will give them, if they so desire, complete and full information about those who should be investigated. I receive letters and information every day. Some of it may be good and some of it bad, but in the investigation of it we will find those with queer philosophies. We as a nation should hold no hatreds in our hearts toward any foreign nation or toward any place; but, by the same token, those nations should not hold hatreds toward us.

I do not believe there is a nation in the world today that despises the United States or hates us, except for the gold that is now stored in our holes and burial grounds in various parts of the United States. This gold, by the way, is not owned by the American Government, and it is not owned by the people of the United States, but it is owned and controlled by the international invisible government, of which we have representatives in the United States. The Dies committee may obtain evidence, at least enough for investigation, if they want to go to bat for the American people.

The second day of the trial was a repetition of the first. General Moseley was asked questions by the inquisitor, Mr. Whitley, concerning letters and episodes which no one could be expected to remember. After having tried to recall, or, I should say, rather, forced to answer by orders of the committee on the threat of contempt, General Moseley was then confronted with letters seized or photographed by the Intelligence Service-I hesitate to designate it thus. This material consisted of his personal letters, speeches, and correspondence of other persons. Paragraphs were selected from various communications-his own and others-and questions were asked by the interrogator, Mr. Whitley, or anyone on the committee-a sort of "free-for-all" to smear General Moseley.

When the general imparted information of value and it was not to the liking of the committee, it was ordered to be stricken from the record. I have seen many trials, but never one like this, in which every effort was made to keep evidence out of the record. To cap the climax, General Moseley's final statement was ordered stricken from the record in toto. This, in my opinion, was a grave error on the part of the committee, which I am sure it will regret some day. Everyone I saw afterward, and with whom I talked, seemed to have the impression that the committee acted under orders, or was not interested in obtaining information with respect to un-American activities. Whether this is true or not remains with the committee, but it leaves a bad impression on those present when the Nation's life and security is at stake. This is particularly true when we are right in the midst of un-American activities, or rather, communistic activities. In this I include socialism, which is the basic foundation of all socalled un-American activities. Communism is behind all the strikes and strife here in this country. The Communists are the ones who will destroy us if we continue to remain asleep.

The Dies committee was appointed by the Speaker, with the request and consent of the Congress of the United States. It follows, therefore, that Congress is responsible for the manner in which the investigation is conducted and also for the result obtained from such investigation. The taxpayers are being charged $100,000 so that this committee can obtain and discover the truth. Congress is responsible to these people and should, therefore, endeavor to determine the facts. The purpose of the committee is for investigation into the very roots of all un-American activities, and not what the committee thinks we ought to know. The committee has no right to strike any evidence from the record, because all information belongs to Congress and the people. The people in the United States today want the truth in its simple nakedness. This committee conducted a trial of General Moseley instead of an investigation, but the committee did not pronounce the sentence. They tried to prepare cause for punishment of the general, but instead of finding an "un-American" they found a most sincere and loyal citizen and

I regret to hold the viewpoint I do with respect to the activities of the committee, but I am here as a representative of the people of my State, and in the interest of all the people of the United States, but not as a convenience to departments or bureaus in this planned government.

ORDER OF BUSINESS NEXT WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader if he has the program arranged for next week?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; as definitely as can be arranged at the present time. On Monday, of course, we will consider bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The so-called Roosevelt library contribution will be on that calendar. If it is objected to, it is my understanding that the Speaker will recognize the gentleman from Illinois to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. It is also my understanding that the Committee on Labor has reported a revised wage and hour bill, and I believe it is the intention of the Speaker to recognize the gentlewoman from New Jersey on Monday to move to suspend the rules and pass that bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Has that bill been printed, so the Members may know what it contains?

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand the bill was reported yesterday or today.

On Tuesday, if the Committee on Ways and Means is ready, we shall start general debate on the amendments to the Social Security Act. Of course, Wednesday will be Calendar Wednesday. The remainder of the week we shall continue the consideration of the social-security legislation.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman any knowledge of how long general debate will run on the socialsecurity bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have not discussed that with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. I always go along with what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY | agree on.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There probably would not be any chance of that bill being voted on on Tuesday? Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. General debate would run at least through Tuesday?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I believe quite some time will be taken in the debate.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, may I say that the Committee on Ways and Means is still in session this morning, so the chairman is detained at that meeting. Unless the gentleman has seen the gentleman from North Carolina quite recently, I might add that he has called a meeting for this afternoon to see if we cannot complete the consideration and preparation of the social-security bill. The gentleman from North Carolina hopes to present the revised bill before the House adjourns today, I believe, but there is a good deal of work to be done by the committee yet, and whether or not that will be accomplished remains to be seen.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, under the unanimous consent that was given, if the committee does not complete its work by the time the House adjourns we can ask unanimous consent that the committee may have until 12 o'clock tonight or tomorrow night to report the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I believe it would be advisable that the gentleman ask that permission, or I will request it if the gentleman wishes me to, because the chairman has told us that he would call us in session tomorrow if we could not complete the consideration of the bill at an evening meeting tonight.

Mr. RAYBURN. Let us let it go along until a little later in the day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point by including a short newspaper article from the New York Herald Tribune describing an amusing incident that occurred in the House of Commons last week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Lewis]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The article is as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of May 26, 1939]

BETTER BE DUMB THAN BORING, SPEAKER ADVISES GAGGED M. P.'S—HE RECALLS DISRAELI'S ADVICE THAT THE NEW MEMBERS BE SEEN BUT NOT

London, May 25.—Stern, bewigged Captain the Right Honorable London, May 25.—Stern, bewigged Captain the Right Honorable Edward Algernon FitzRoy, who is Speaker of the House of Commons, but never makes a speech, was confronted today by two M. P.'s who complained that Government leaders and opposition "big guns" had taken up 8 of the 11 hours allotted for the Palestine debate on Monday and Tuesday, thereby robbing many "back benchers" of a chance to air their views.

"Disraell," recalled FitzRoy, "was once asked by a new member whether he would advise him to take part in debates. Disraeli said, 'No; I don't think you ought to do so, because it is much better that the House should wonder why you do not speak than why you do.'

"My advice is much the same. It is much better, when a member resumes his seat after speaking, that the House should have the feeling that he ought to have gone on longer instead of wondering why he did not stop sooner."

POSITION OF UNDER SECRETARY IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the consent given by the House, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2314) to establish the position of Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mapes] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2314; and pending that motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 2 hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and one-half by himself.

Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CULKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the gentleman what this bill covers?

Mr. LEA. The bill proposes the creation of the position of Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. Lea]?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2314, with Mr. Pace in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us, S. 2314, provides for establishing the position of Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce. There is a further provision in the bill that on the resignation of one of the two present Assistant Secretaries of the Department of Commerce that position shall in effect become vacated, and no further appointment shall be made to it.

The bill provides that the salary of the Under Secretary of Commerce shall be $10,000 a year. This is the same salary as is now applicable to similar positions in the four other departments of the Government in which there are Under Secretaries. At the present time the Assistant Secretaries receive a salary of $9,000 each, so the amount of expense involved by the enactment of this measure will be $1,000 a year.

The departments now having Under Secretaries are the Departments of State, Treasury, Agriculture, and the Interior. The first of these positions of Under Secretary was established in 1874, the second in 1922, and the other two within the last 5 years.

I call your attention in brief to some of the duties performed by the Department of Commerce under the existing law. The following duties are within the responsibility of the Department of Commerce:

The Lighthouse Service; the Census; the Coast and Geodetic Survey; the duty of preparing and furnishing statistics of foreign and domestic commerce; the inspection of steamships and the enforcement of provisions in connection with that subject; the supervision of the fisheries under the Federal Government; the Alaska fur seal, salmon, and other fisheries; jurisdiction over the merchant vessels of the country, including the enforcement of the laws relating to them; the standards of weights and measures; the gathering of information regarding industries and markets; and fostering manufacturing.

The fundamental and the great purpose, outside of the mere control of the bureaus and the divisions in the Department of Commerce, is in the duty of the Secretary of Commerce in promoting the commerce of the United States and its manufacturing, shipping, fishing, and transportation interests. There is his greatest opportunity for usefulness.

In addition to that fundamental duty and the supervision of these bureaus to which I have referred, the Secretary acts as chairman of a number of bureaus or organizations. He is the Chairman of the Foreign Trade Zone Board and he is General Chairman of the Business Advisory Council of the Department. I refer to this class of duties resting upon the Commerce Department to show the connection of that Department with the business life of the country. The Secretary is a member of the board of directors of the Textile Foundation. He is a member of the Council of National Defense. He is a member of the Federal Board of Vocational Education. He is one of the Directors in the Smithsonian Institution. He is a member of the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission. He is on the Board of the Foreign Service Buildings Commission. He is on the National Munitions Control Board, the Central Statistical Committee, the National Resources Committee, Export and Import Bank of Washington, National Archives Council, Committee on Regulation of the Securities Act, and the Central Housing Com-

You will recognize by reference to these duties that the Secretary of Commerce has a great responsibility in respect to the busines life of the country.

I shall read briefly from a letter of Secretary Hopkins to the committee, which is embodied in the report.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEA. I yield.

Mr. RICH. What experience has the Secretary, Mr. Hopkins, had to deal with the business life of America? What qualifies him or fits him for a position such as he now holds in the Department?

Mr. LEA. In the early career of Mr. Hopkins we might have conceded that he had little business experience, as business ordinarily goes. He has since had great experience in public affairs and I would say in business affairs, since he has been the head of the W. P. A. But the particular point of this legislation is that we now propose to bring in as Under Secretary a man of broad and successful business experience to assist the Secretary of Commerce. In my judgment if there has been any time in the last 30 years when it was necessary to have business leadership in our Departments it is now.

Mr. RICH. I agree with the gentleman, and I have just one other question.

Mr. LEA. Permit me to say further in that connection that the biggest job, as I conceive it, right now for the United States is to have that quality of business judgment that rises to the dignity and importance of statesmanship to bring together and set to work the idle money and the idle men of this country.

Mr. RICH. I agree with the gentleman about that, and the only thing now is to know whom they are going to select for the position of Under Secretary of Commerce. Will he be a man of experience, a man of ability, a man who has made his way through life or is it going to be some politician or someone who has had no business experience? If it is the latter, then this will simply be creating another political job. It seems to me it is most important that the man who is selected shall have had experience and proven ability to handle the matters we have in mind. They cannot go out and take someone who simply wants a job. They have got to go out and find a man such as I have suggested.

Mr. LEA. I agree with the gentleman in that respect. I am in position to assure you that the gentleman who will be appointed Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce measures us to the requirements specified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is Mr. Noble, who was until recently head of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and who is now temporarily in the Department of Commerce. He is a man of vast business experience and a successful man. I am confident that in ability and in disinterested purpose to serve the country he really measures up to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. If the gentleman will permit me to make an observation, Mr. Noble does completely meet the specifications of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich]. He is a self-made and a self-educated man, a power in big business, and I think I may say without violating any confidence, a progressive Republican.

Mr. LEA. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution, and I think we have to recognize that this is a time when in a matter of this sort there should be no politics. It is so important to this country to have the service of able, practical men that if we can get the right man from the Republican Party, or anywhere, he should be welcomed.

Mr. CULKIN. And may I say further that, in my judgment, this is the first encouraging step toward appearement of business I have seen.

Mr. LEA. I appreciate that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt myself about the gentleman whose nomination is contemplated. I think he is eminently fit. However, there is one thing I desire to inquire about and that is this: Unless one of these Assistant Secretaries resigns, then in the passage of this bill we are creating a new office that will cost the Government $10,000 a year. Is not that correct?

Mr. LEA. That is true; but one of the Assistant Secretaries has resigned already.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is there a vacancy there now?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And it will not be filled until this bill is passed?

Mr. LEA. It will not be filled at all after this appointment is made, nor before. I am authorized to assure the House that is true.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then, as a matter of fact, it will cost the Government only an additional $1,000 a year, assuming that statement to be correct.

Mr. LEA. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I express my great sympathy for the gentleman's attitude, but as one of the few Members on this side of the House who voted to create the last Under Secretary, I do think that the Record should be clear that our confidence there was terrifically betrayed. I refer to the Under Secretary of the Interior. At the solicitation of the Secretary and the administration, I voted to create that position. A man was appointed who had no qualifications in that regard, and who became simply a political liaison officer here and the Secretary himself was finally obliged forcibly to eject his Under Secretary from the office. I do hope the gentleman is in a position to assure us that that situation is not going to be repeated in connection with Mr. Hopkins, who, of course, is not politically-minded himself, coming, as Mr. Farley has pointed out, without political background or experience.

Mr. LEA. I can assure the gentleman that I am definitely authorized to say what I have said, and unless someone is very much more crooked than I have reason to suspect, I have no doubt that what I have said will occur.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Is the man already selected for this position?

Mr. LEA. He is what is called a dollar-a-year man, just at present in the Commerce Department, but there is no authority to select him for this position at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Is the man created for the position or the position for the man?

Mr. LEA. I would say that this is a case where the man is created for the position, because there is nothing from a financial or a political standpoint that is an inducement for this man's service. I know Mr. Noble, and I sincerely believe he has the ability and a sincere and disinterested purpose to perform a real service for his country.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. The money that pays for this man's services must be charged to the Federal debt. Does the gentleman think that this is the time to add a single person to the Federal pay roll?

Mr. LEA. I certainly do, if you can get a man whose ability and experience qualifies him to perform a useful service, to help pull us out of this depression. The additional cost of this man's service will be only $1,000 a year or less than $3 a day. It is no time to hesitate about $3 a day if his broad experience in business offers a service of any value.

I was very much pleased to learn of the attitude of Mr. Hopkins to try to encourage business at this time to bring men and jobs together. In the letter which he wrote the committee he used this language:

From another point of view the creation of the position of Under Secretary would be helpful. It is my hope that the Department can do more than it has attempted in the past in the way of formulating and carrying into effect policies that will result in fostering and developing our commerce and industry.

and developing our commerce and industry.

In developing affirmative policies I want the help of the best brains and experience that I can get. The establishment of this under-secretaryship is a step in that direction. That position would obviously carry such responsibility and prestige as to make it attractive to men of caliber and capacity who can really help to do something for industry. An under-secretaryship will make it more practicable to procure men of the desired qualities to take the post.

Since coming to the Department of Commerce I have been impressed with the importance and the difficulty of the problems with which it is faced. Many of these originate abroad and need special attention. We are also familiar with the continuing changes and shifts that are constantly occurring in the domestic field. It is my hope that I can so organize the Department of Commerce that it will play a constructive part in producing a more uniform and higher level of industrial activity.

What we need in the Department is more organization at the top that will utilize and apply for the benefit of industry the good work that is being done by the bureaus. The creation of the office of Under Secretary is only a part of my program in that respect, but it is an important part.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired. The gentleman has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wadsworth].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this bill. To state it in one sentence, I believe it is wholly unnecessary. The Government does not require the creation of this office in order to serve the public. In passing let me say that I do not for one moment criticize the gentleman who has been mentioned here, Mr. Noble, whom we have been told, and I think authoritatively, will be appointed as Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce in the event this legislation is enacted.

I know of him by reputation. He is an excellent man. He has made a success in business. It may be of interest to the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle to know that he has made his major success in the manufacture of Life Savers, which I understand are a confection in popular use.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LEA. Is it not true that that was his initial work, but in subsequent years he has engaged in a wide variety of business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No doubt he has had wide experience. His initial success was in the Life Saver field. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Does not the gentleman believe that the expression "life saver" might be prophetic in this connection? He might save the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I stated in my observation a moment ago that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle might be interested in the knowledge that this gentleman, Mr. Noble, made his initial success with a "life saver." It might very well be, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Noble can do excellent service in helping to save something. I doubt, however, that it is necessary to make him Under Secretary of Commerce in order to obtain the benefit of his talents. It occurs to me he could be appointed to the position now vacant, of Assistant Secretary, and that he could do just as good work there as he could with the other title.

True, the difference in salary is only $1,000. That is not a staggering sum, to be sure, but it merely indicates the trend that has been going on here for so long. It strikes me that it is unnecessary.

If you will read the letter of the Secretary of Commerce you can get some understanding of why this position is wanted.

He says:

Situations constantly arise where it would be very helpful if I could delegate specific tasks to an officer who is known to be second in command.

I had always thought that the Assistant Secretary was second in command. That reasoning does not seem very persuasive.

It happens very often that there is more than one important conference to be attended at the same time, and it would be very helpful if one of my assistants were officially known as the Under Secretary of Commerce.

That is not very persuasive.

There are also occasions when it is necessary for the Secretary to be represented at meetings with foreign officers, where it is desirable that the Secretary's representative shall bear such a title.

The inference from that is that the Assistant Secretary may not wear spats and the Under Secretary may. [Laughter.] That is about the only difference that I can see.

The Secretary goes on:

The conversion of one of the Assistant Secretaryships into an Under Secretaryship will be of very real assistance in these situa-

Now, there is the whole argument. If the House takes it seriously, it will pass this bill and create this position. I am not persuaded.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. It is purely a matter of window dressing, is it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the only conclusion I can reach from that paragraph, that it is a little window dressing at a cost of $1,000 a year.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. From the information the gentleman has concerning the present man who is selected for this post, would he not say that the man himself is excellently qualified for the position of Secretary of Commerce, and perhaps make some comparison in the qualifications as between the Secretary and the proposed Under Secretary?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that upon this occasion comparisons would be odious. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I might observe that probably the real reason for this legislation is to show the distinction between the intellect of an Assistant Secretary and an Under Secretary. He says:

In developing affirmative policies I want the help of the best brains and experience that I can get. The establishment of this Under Secretaryship is a step in that direction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose the Secretary argues that he cannot get brains unless he puts a title on him, and that a man of Mr. Noble's achievements could not be expected to bear simply the title of Assistant Secretary. So, therefore we shall create the office of Under Secretary, and in such position Mr. Noble will be infinitely more effective than he would be were he simply Assistant Secretary. Just think of it! He is going to sit in conferences, day after day! How important it is that he be addressed by his colleagues as Mr. Under Secretary.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman has stated that the logic expressed in the letter of the Secretary was not convincing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not use the word "logic." [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Then, that the statement was not convincing to you.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The statement was not convincing to me.

Mr. MASON. Do you think it should be or is convincing to the Nation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot believe the Nation is so gullible as to be impressed with this argument.

Mr. MASON. Does the gentleman think, then, that the House will be gullible enough to be impressed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I await the event.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Under section 2 of the bill it would appear that certain additional duties are conferred upon the Under Secretary in addition to those which an ordinary Assistant Secretary performs. This, it seems to me, is to be read into the letter of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Section 2 of the bill reads:

Such Under Secretary shall perform the duties of the Secretary of Commerce in case of the absence or sickness of the Secretary.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. That is a clear designation of who is to act under such circumstances.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but would not the First Assistant perform the same functions?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I am not at all sure that without this bill he would be empowered so to act. This is what the bill places beyond question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Unless I am very much mistaken, it is the unbroken custom of the departments that the second in command, no matter what his title, performs the duties of the chief of the department during the absence of the chief.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. That is a matter of statutory law, of course; but my very clear conclusion from the terms of section 2 is that that is not the case in regard to any of the Assistant Secretaries of Commerce.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose the gentleman will admit that if the situation exists it could be cured.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I think it will be cured by this

Mr. WADSWORTH. By creating a new office?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. By designating some one to act, specifically designating some one to act in the absence of the Secretary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But this bill goes further than that and creates a new office.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Oh, yes; and designates the duties of the office.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the gentleman think it worth while to create the office for the reasons given?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman and I disagree.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I shall not need 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I will not contend that this bill is of epochmaking importance. I think we are not going to debate it for 2 hours. In the discussions before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I ventured some of these observations, that the thing is at best decorative, it will have no practical effect worthy of the name; and as the gentleman from Tennessee said, it is window dressing. The whole question is, Does the House and the Congress desire to create the office for this sole purpose?

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I want to be correctly informed with respect to the duties and responsibilities of the Under Secretary. Do I understand the gentleman to suggest that in the absence of the Secretary, the Under Secretary would perform the duties of the office insofar as sitting in Cabinet meetings is concerned?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply call attention to the second section of the bill;

He shall perform the duties of the Secretary of Commerce in the case of the sickness or absence of the Secretary.

It lies within the power of the President, of course, to invite any officer of the Government to be present at a Cabinet meeting.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the offices of First Assistant Postmaster General, Second Assistant Postmaster General, Third Assistant Postmaster General, and Fourth Assistant Postmaster General were to be changed into the positions of First Under Postmaster General, Second Under Postmaster General, Third Under Postmaster General, and Fourth Under Postmaster General, how far under would the Fourth Under Postmaster General be?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He would be down with the submarines.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Plumley].

CAN THIS GOVERNMENT OF, FOR, AND BY THE PEOPLE SURVIVE A "THIRD TERM" OF, BY, AND FOR THE NEW DEAL?

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, last week was dubbed "National Debt Week." Why not? Is not every week under the New Deal National Debt Week? So is every day and month and year, for that matter, and will be for generations yet to come. The only thing to which my New Deal friends could have taken exception would have been the labeling of the week as "New Deal National Debt Week," and that on the ground that it was partisan politics—otherwise they could not justifiably take any exception to the truth.

Under the New Deal administration and program we are spending $10,000,000,000 every year. The national debt crossed the $40,000,000,000 mark last month. We pay out $15,000 a minute, or $21,600,000 a day.

A $10,000,000-A-DAY DEFICIT

We are running a $10,000,000-a-day deficit, totaling a $30,-000,000 a month or a $3,650,000,000 deficit a year. Think that over. Just try to run your own business on that basis and see where you will be headed.

In 1913 it cost each family $34 a year to help support the Government, while under the New Deal program it costs each family $540.

In 1920 the national debt was twenty-four-billion-and-some-odd million, most all of it due to our participation in that great adventure which was to make the world safe for democracy. By 1930 we had paid off some eight billion of that debt, during that period when we all sang the joyful refrain of prosperity. Then came the beginning of the bad days. Before the Republican Party was pushed cut of power the debt had climbed again to twenty-two billion. That was in 1933, when the Democratic New Deal Party came into power, with the promise of its leader that he would promptly bury old man depression—the Roosevelt phrasing—and end all Government deficits by a program of strict economy; all of which promises were speedily repudiated.

DEFICIT FOR 1939 WILL BE FORTY-ONE BILLIONS PLUS

So, beginning with a debt of twenty-two billion at the end of the fiscal year 1933, the national debt has jumped annually, first by five billion, then by nearly two billion, then by five billion, then by three billion, then by one billion, until at the end of the last fiscal year it had reached $37,167,487,451. The estimated deficit for 1939 puts the debt at forty-one billion, with an estimate at the close of 1940 of nearly forty-five billion.

THE PUBLIC DEBT HAS DOUBLED

In the 6 years of the New Deal administration, the public debt has doubled. On March 4, 1933, it was $20,937,000,000; on June 30, 1940, it is expected to amount to $44,457,845,210. That is the kind of "gambling" which the New Deal has encouraged. The President told his audience of Monday, week ago, that "balancing the Budget today, or even next year, is a pretty difficult, if not impossible job." It is difficult because Mr. Roosevelt has in the past made no effort to effect economies. He and his associates have spent with lavish hand. As a result, the per capita debt of the Nation now is $305, as compared with $131 in 1931.

In 1913 Federal taxes consumed 1.9 percent of the national income; last year they took 10.9 percent. Government revenues have swelled during the period in which the national debt has mounted to new heights. In 1934 revenues amounted to $3,115,554,000; this year they are estimated at $5,669,000,000. But no matter how much the Government receives, it spends more than it gets. The yearly deficit is added to the total of the national debt and the spending is continued.

But that is not the beginning or the end of the story. Under New Deal leadership in the past few years the Government has assumed a contingent liability on obligations amounting to $4,416,000,000. These include loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Commodity Credit Corporation, Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, Federal Housing Administration, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and the United States Housing Authority.

To assume that these agencies will be in a position to defray their obligations in full is to ignore the general record of the Government as a banker. The showing of the past would indicate heavy losses when complete liquidation is achieved.

GROSS TOTAL DEBT AROUND $50,000,000,000

The Federal debt currently is about $41,000,000,000. If we are to add the approximate $5,000,000,000 of contingent liabilities, we have a total of $46,000,000,000. Using the estimated figures for the 1940 debt total of $44,457,845,210, the gross total is only slightly under $50,000,000,000.

Just take time out and ask yourself, "Where are we heading?" By "we" I mean all of us. Those people who are unemployed should be as deeply concerned as the others. Those on relief more so, if anything. This program must be changed or the end for all of us is in sight.

CANDIDATE FOR THIRD TERM

What do I think of the President's speech to the Retail Federation, you ask? I thought it had all the earmarks of a campaign speech. As I listened to it I made up my mind that the President was speaking as one who was a candidate. Certainly no other conclusion can be drawn than that it was the speech of one who did not intend to surrender any of his power or to return to Congress any of the delegated authority he now exercises due to its subservience. I may be wrong, but to me it sounded like a challenge to those, especially of his own party, who would or might seek to deprive him of a third term. He told them and all of us that he, for one, did not intend to repudiate the policies of the New Deal. He said:

You cannot expect this administration to alter the principles and objectives for which we have struggled the last 6 years.

This being interpreted liberally means only one thing, and that, namely, the spending for recovery program of his administration will not be abandoned, but will be pursued with redoubled vigor throughout the remainder of this term and into the next, as a policy which he will undertake to make a definite and a cardinal element of the platform of his party for 1940. It is a definite, positive notice to those in his party who do not agree with his spending policy that he intends to say what the policy shall be, and they might as well know He intends to have his way, and they are put on notice of that fact. He makes it so plain, that he who runs may read; that in his opinion, at least, he is the only man who can hope for nomination and election by the Democratic Party, whether they like it or not.

He is to be commended for his frankness. The country now knows what it has a right to expect if he be reelected, namely, a continuation of the New Deal policies.

The astounding feature of his speech was the fiscal philosophy of it, which, if sound—which it is not—makes possible the statement that-

The national debt, instead of being a mere $40,000,000,000, as at present, might just as well be a hundred or two hundred billion.

PHILOSOPHICAL CLAPTRAP

And, moreover, if his philosophy and line of reasoning is to be followed, the people would still owe the money to themselves and still be paying the interest to themselves. What claptrap!

Incidentally, it may be said that if he be given credit for integrity of thought, one cannot believe he entertains any such belief.

This is not consistent with what he has said and thought heretofore. I know all about what is said concerning consistency, but what about simple, common honesty? Not to beg the question, when he was a candidate in 1932 he was shocked by the lavish spending of the Hoover administration-a little more than half the amount the Roosevelt administration will spend during the coming year, or so he said, emphatically.

He warned us of the dangers inherent in the "great" volume of spending which was made necessary in 1932, and he promised if he were elected to reduce the National Budget

According to my opinion that was a sound position for him to take. A great many people took him at his word. I ask you what it was worth. Today, or the other evening, he labeled as hypocrites those who express concern at a volume of governmental deficit spending that was unthought of before he was elected.

It just does not make sense. Everybody but the President, perhaps, realizes that the billions of dollars the New Deal has poured into pump-priming efforts have failed to produce the desired results, and another Presidential election is a little more than a year away. From the time of Abraham Lincoln politicians in the driver's seat have clung to the axiom that it is unwise to change horses in the middle of the stream. That being so, it was not surprising to hear the President tell his audience of retailers that "you cannot expect this administration to alter the principles and objectives for which we have struggled for the last 6 years."

FUTURE GENERATIONS WILL PAY-"THROUGH THE NOSE"

He told the Retail Federation that there is no need to worry about future generations paying the interest on the national debt because they would be paying it to themselves. This is in line with some other statements he has made within the last 7 or 8 months. Somebody convinced him that such a statement was "right smart," but it is not.

The truth is, as a majority of the people in this country know, when he propounds that financial theory he supports a doctrine which has been responsible for governmental repudiation and inflation down through the ages. Look at Germany, where the internal debt was repudiated on the theory that it was owed by the Government to the people and by the people to the Government.

As someone has lately said, what is overlooked is that the whole debt structure of the Nation, private and public, is interwoven, and that if interests on Government debt is going to be permitted to grow on the theory that a government can always collect enough to pay it, there will be little regard given to the sanctity of debt contracts involving the Government, because in the end confiscation will be necessary in order to get enough taxes to pay debt.

By the time future generations are up against the problem of paying the debt incurred today it may not be a case of paying interest but of repudiating it, as well as the principal, on the ground that the burden is too great to be borne. Outright repudiation, however, does not need to happen. Political governments have in past centuries found it easier to devalue the monetary unit and then the purchasing power of their currency.

The truth is also that millions, yes, billions of dollars, representing wealth dug from the earth and wrested from the sea, brought to public treasuries by the tax gatherers, was and still is being, and if the President carries out his announced intention, will be wasted in an unprofitable expenditure in an attempt to create a prosperity as unreal and as unsubstantial as the dreams of an opium eater.

Someone sent me a clipping from the New York Herald Tribune, I judge, which is apparently a portion of a letter written by one who signs the letter as "Civitas" and writes from Patchogue, N. Y. The clipping reads as follows:

POLICY OF PAUPERIZATION

For 7 long years we have been teaching our people that the Government owes them a living and that the underprivileged are being mulcted by the rich and powerful. They are being encouraged to believe that the man who toils and struggles under the impetus of any of the above-cited stimuli is no better off than the thriftless and improvident, the lazy and profligate. They are being taught, by precept and example, that we are all entitled to "economic security," when all history teaches us that every man must make his own security if he wishes to survive. Thinkers of all ages have always foreseen what would happen and what has happened when any considerable part of the population, whether the idle rich or the idle poor, is sustained by the fruits of the labor and thrift of the rest of the population, or when such part of the population becomes obscessed with the idea that people have a right to look to government and society to guarantee them a living. We have now reached, very definitely, a point where it must be recognized that the Government must do one of two things:

First. It must yield to this false philosophy and the pressure For 7 long years we have been teaching our people that the Gov-

First It must yield to this false philosophy and the pressure which it has engendered and sacrifice all our institutions of freedom for some new system which will reduce us all to a dead level of impotent hopelessness.

Second. It must actively resist this philosophy at any cost. It must recognize the indisputable fact that any scheme, any political or economic doctrine which embraces the fallacy that we can make everyone rich and that everyone may be indulged in a life of ease and comfort by putting all enterprise and industry and the life-giving power of individual initiative into a strait jacket can only end by power of individual initiative into a strait jacket can only end by making everyone poor and abjectly miserable.

I believe that it is the duty of our leaders to conduct a wholesome and spirited campaign of education to the end that the people, the hard working and the poorest of us all, will come to an intelligent realization that to adopt the first of the above alternatives will force upon them the worst of all disasters. It would bring the most abject poverty and wretchedness of spirit that the western world has ever known. The property-owning class and the intelligent among our citizenry must, in order to survive, grasp the power of government. citizenry must, in order to survive, grasp the power of government and rebuild our social organism with a ruthless disregard for the weak and the truculent, the incompetent, the thriftless, or the lazy. Yes; even for the merely unfortunate.

The issue, it seems to me, is not a matter of deficit spending, although that in all conscience is demoralizing enough in itself. It may, and if continued will, bankrupt us financially. But you cannot bankrupt a strong, virile people by ruining them financially. The things that are being done with this money is what will bankrupt our people, because it is already corrupting them with the false lure of a fancied, easy security.

What this country and our people need most of all is a return to plain, hard work, self-sacrifice, and a grim determination to be economically independent of any form of charity or social help. With these qualities regained our people would gain a spiritual regeneration, which is the only sound basis of any civilization.

To those of us who think we can see the forest despite the trees, the truth is obvious. It takes unlimited nerve to suggest to the American people that the defense of democracy involves an unreserved and unreasonable endorsement of the program and policies of the New Deal program of the last few years and looking toward the future. way, the way suggested to the Retail Federation, leads to national bankruptcy, repudiation, and inflation, and nowhere

AN INDEFENSIBLE ATTEMPT TO ALIBI

And let me say to you there is something naive in the President's effort to shift responsibility to Congress for the financial plight of the Government. He, and he alone, created the swiftly rising tide of bureaucrats, the colossal appropriations, and the policies of relief, agriculture, T. V. A., and what not else, that have sunk the Federal Government perilously deep in debt and lifted the appropriations so far beyond income as to make balancing the Budget a labor calling for fresh abilities and vision of the first rank. "What are you going to do about it?" exclaims the President in effect to Congress. There may be new dealers in the House and Senate abject enough to take this challenge lying down, but we are confident the great majority resent it bitterly. Must a rubber stamp be jeered at by its own master?

REPUBLICAN OPPOSITION TO NEW DEAL PROGRAM

I want to tell you right here and now that the Republican Party positively has no use for and takes no stock in the suggestion or proposition that any central, one-man brain can, will, or must do the thinking of all the people. It therefore has been, and is, and will continue to be opposed to the continuation of a program, the sole purpose and intent of which is to accomplish this very thing. Under such a system chaos is inevitable. It has opposed and will continue to oppose the crazy, experimental notions and attempts to have a oneman, centralized, bureaucratic government. In this opposition it has attempted to legislate protectively and constructively and to the fullest extent which the people have made it possible for it so to do. The people forced it to be the party of opposition. It has been such, and will continue so to be, and in your interest.

It is also true the Republican Party insists upon economy and efficiency in local, State, and Federal governmental administration—the elimination and avoidance of duplication of public services, a balancing of the Budget, and the protection of the taxpayer.

A CONSTRUCTIVE PROGRAM

I am sick and tired, and so are the majority of the people, of all the talk about the failure of the Republican Party to offer a constructive program. Do you not credit us with enough sense to know that any and all measures we might attempt to initiate now would be defeated by the overwhelming majority with which we have to contend in Congress? Nevertheless, we have, over and over again, outlined a program, and in detail, which, when we get the votes, we will enact. This program involves the balancing of the National Budget; the revision or the repeal of the capital-gains tax and the undistributed-profits tax; the establishment of just relations between capital and labor, insisting upon constitutional guaranties of the rights of person and property, the right of the worker to work, of the owner to possession of his property, and of every man to enjoy in peace the fruits of his labor; opposition to the New Deal's government policy of competition with private business and private savings; favoring a competitive system as against either private or governmental monopoly.

It has stood for State and local control, home rule and local self-government; for a reduction of the amount of taxes, Federal, State, and local, which are responsible for the notorious spread between the prices paid farmers and the prices paid by consumers for their products.

The Republican Party has insisted that food, fuel, clothing, and shelter shall be provided, as shall useful work; but it shall be done economically to encourage individual self-reliance and the return to self-dependence.

Until the people put us in power, the Republican Party proposes to continue, both by opposition and cooperation with those who agree, to undertake to preserve and to rely upon the American system in government, the encouragement of private enterprise and the stimulation of initiative, both of which carry the banner of our priceless liberty. Until you return the Republican Party to power, it will necessarily continue to be, perforce of its minority status, the party of opposition to all the un-American, unconstitutional, ineffective, and extravagant theories with respect to government that have been foisted upon us by the discredited, decrepit, and rapidly disintegrating New Deal.

As a minority party we are ready to support all steps necessary to permit, stimulate, and sustain business revival and business employment. We will work earnestly and unceasingly, as Minority Leader Joseph W. Martin, Jr., has so well said, to-

1. Keep the United States out of war.

2. Move immediately to curb unnecessary, wasteful, and reckless spending.

- 3. Repeal the repressive tax on undistributed corporate earnings, which has proved so harassing and dangerous to business, large and

- small.

 4. Revise the remainder of the Federal tax structure to eliminate or modify provisions retarding business recovery.

 5. Repeal the dangerous discretionary authority which the President now has over the Nation's monetary system.

 6. Amend the National Labor Relations Act by clarifying the mutual obligations of worker and employer and the duties of both toward the public in order to end present paralyzing discord.

 7. Define specifically the area of Government competition with private enterprise so that business may be able to create jobs with some certainty as to the future.

 8. Restore American markets to the American farmer and wage earner and develop new markets for agricultural products.

 9. Adopt immediate legislation to rehabilitate the railroads to make secure the jobs of many hundreds of thousands of workers and the investments of savings banks and life insurance companies.

 10. Create a special committee in Congress to inquire into the effect of the reciprocal-trade agreement policy on American industry and agriculture. and agriculture.
- 11. Clarify Federal rules and regulations so industry and business may know what to expect.

 12. Reject all experimental legislation not clearly helpful in
- promoting recovery, or which would subject agriculture, labor, or industry to compulsory decrees of a Federal bureaucracy.

SHORT MEMORIES

The people have short memories, but they should not, in their own interest, be permitted to forget the steps which have been taken under the philosophy of the New Deal in its impacts upon true American liberalism and fundamental Americanism from which it has departed. They should be constantly reminded of the fact that, and by iteration and reiteration it should be driven home to them that, as others have said, and I repeat, liberty comes alone, and lives alone, where the hard won rights of men are held unalienable, where governments themselves may not infringe, where governments are indeed but the mechanisms to protect and sustain these liberties from encroachment. It was this for which our fathers died; it was this heritage they gave to us. It was not the provisions with regard to interstate commerce or the determination of weights and measures or coinage for which the Constitution was devised—it was the guaranties that men possessed fundamental liberties apart from the state, that they were not the pawns but the masters of the state. It is not because liberty is unworkable, but because we have not worked it conscientiously or have forgotten its true meaning that we often get the notion of the irreconcilable conflict with the machine age.

It must be impressed upon all Americans that it is true as stated that today everywhere individual liberties are being curtailed and destroyed. Democracy and self-government are scrapped. Individuals are once more the pawns of arbitrary rulers, whose policies are determined by nationalistic aims, with war as their ultimate and supreme weapon. Greater and greater rigidities undermine the flexibility and adaptiveness of economic systems. Planned and controlled economies emerge. Tariffs, exchange restrictions, quotas, import prohibitions, barter trade agreements, central tradeclearing arrangements—all the rusty relics of medieval trade regulations, discredited through 500 years of theory and hard experience are dragged out. The doctrines of self-containment and self-sufficiency reenforce the rigidities and restrictions of planning and give rise to new international antagonisms.

DO WE HAVE TO BE TOLD THAT?

Nations are feverishly rearming: new instruments of destruction are being forged from diminishing resources; people whose salvation depends upon mutual cooperation in the peaceful process of reconstruction are staring at each other with growing mistrust and antagonism; international trade languishes; standards of living are falling; great nations are being threatened with economic collapse-and, to sustain economic life, governments are creating purchasing power by exhausting a rapidly vanishing credit.

CANNOT WE BELIEVE OUR EYES?

The question which confronts the American people today is: Having a system which has given history a record of greater security and comfort to a greater number than ever in all human history before; having, without sacrifice of liberty, solved our dangers time and again; having the capacity, the will, and the method to keep solving them, shall we now surrender to follow paths which can lead only to deadened inspirations and abandoned freedoms?

Can this Government of, for, and by the people survive a third term of, for, and by the New Deal? Let the people answer.

Of course they, the people, will answer. They will not even try it, much less tolerate it.

Our people are made of different stuff. We and they are going to stop deceiving ourselves and being deceived. We know that under a Republican administration the American system has included and will include every social benefit that men have devised; that the American method has already won more for our people than any other system on earth has ever won for its people.

We know that under a Republican administration, with honesty, intelligence, and industry and a vigilant regard for the rights of every man, woman, and child, this country can and will rise into such plenty as to make the New Deal continued depression seem like a trivial bump on the road. It will take time to smooth the road, to get back on the main highway, and to abandon the New Deal detours to a "more abundant life"—God save the mark!—but it can and will be done. Not all the false New Deal prophets on earth can convince the American people that the American way is a bad way or that it cannot succeed. They know it can, and they propose to give it a chance. In it is the real hope of all humanity even now.

That, succinctly stated, is the essence of the Republican platform for Americans. The American people will vote American.

As George H. Davis, retiring president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, is quoted as saying a few days ago:

The locked door to recovery is confidence. Reform legislation and a deliberate Government policy of fostering discord and hate are sealing up incentive's coffin.

But, said he:

In this country we are always safe when the people understand the facts. Now they do understand. The signs are everywhere. Like a mighty army marching. The American people are aroused at last, as they realize the dangers to their freedom. Now America is fighting for the preservation of its own life. Victory is in sight!

[Applause.]

Mr. Plumley asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLeop].

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the Federal Communications Commission issued regulations governing the broadcasting of international programs by radio stations in the United States which should alarm Congress, the press, and every person in this country.

These regulations order radio stations to broadcast only international progress of good will. In effect it gives to the Commission the power to tell radio stations what they shall or shall not say over the radio. The Commission uses the term "good will," which signifies that something has to be defined or determined; in other words, censorship of the radio and censorship of speech.

It has long been apparent that the Commission has sought greater control of the air waves, but such a brazen attempt to say what shall or shall not be broadcast—in effect censorship of radio programs—most certainly was not anticipated.

When the F. C. C. attempts to tell the broadcaster what programs he shall broadcast internationally, it knows that if it can get by with this dictation there is just one short step remaining to the control of standard broadcasts or domestic programs, and when that hurdle is cleared radio is under the domination of bureaucracy and ceases to be free.

Mr. Chairman, a little more than two decades ago this Nation had sufficient belief in democratic principles to engage in a horrible and destructive war to protect and preserve what we believed to be the inalienable rights granted by God to man. Our struggles and battles during the past 150 years present additional proof of our determination to combat any attempt to destroy or change the rights extended to our people by the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Fortunately it is not always necessary that we conduct a war to prevent encroachments upon these natural rights. Most of these attempts to verge away from our democratic principles are adjudicated by the Supreme Court. Our forebears in creating this Court realized, as we must realize, that there are bound to be differences of opinion with respect to the various phases of our Constitution. There has been little or no uncertainty, however, regarding certain of the rights granted to us by the Constitution. Among these are religious liberty, freedom of speech and of the press, and others.

These are the natural rights and require limited explanation. We have come to take them as a matter of course. Only when they are in danger of being destroyed do we arise to defend and protect them. Needless to say, there are a few limitations on each of them. Bigamy, for instance, is prohibited, irrespective of religious belief, and freedom of speech and the press does not signify a right to libel.

When the Federal Communications Commission was created by this body it was not intended that censorship was to be part of the Commission's functions. The primary duties of the Commission are to prevent confusion in the air by allocation of wave lengths and to guard against libel or indecency. But here we have a creation of Congress, suddenly turned a Frankenstein, ignoring the will of Congress, and determining just what American radio stations shall or shall not say during international broadcasts. To carry out their purposes, violation of this fascistic principle will warrant revocation of a radio station's license and thereby force it out of business.

Gentlemen, I cannot say to you too strongly that without freedom of opinions, thoughts, and ideas this Nation has no right to entertain any hope for the survival of democratic principles. This regulation is but a small cancer now, but unless it is cut out at the start it will spread like any unattended malignant growth, until finally free speech will be throttled, the press will be a mouthpiece for the few, and radios will blare forth only the ideas of the F. C. C.

Gentlemen, no matter how you view this regulation, you can reach no other conclusion than that this is the most flagrant attempt yet made to stifle and kill the right of free speech. In all the history of our Nation no more audacious or tyrannical step has been taken to destroy a vested right. If not corrected immediately, this regulation can mean the beginning of a Fascist censorship of the press as well as of the radio.

The Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Hughes, has made it clear in a unanimous decision that the scope of Federal regulation over radio relates only to the allocation of facilities. Congress, moreover, in section 326 of the 1934 Federal Communications Act, has specifically prohibited such censorship by the Commission in the following language:

Nothing in this act shall be understood or construed to give the Commission the power of censorship of the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, and no regulation or condition shall be promulgated or fixed by the Commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication. No person within the jurisdiction of the United States shall utter any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication.

The danger of the unadulterated censorship as imposed by the Commission only last week must be apparent to all of you. It is a real threat against the newspaper and the freedom of the individual. It is something abhorrent to every American to whom freedom of speech is a precious heritage.

This action of the Radio Commission is undemocratic control of radio, and we have only to look at some of the countries of the Old World where broadcasting has been converted into the most powerful weapon of dictatorship to fully appreciate the significance of such control.

Heretofore, radio has taken its place with freedom of religion, speech, and the press, but this action completely destroys that freedom and makes it the slave of a bureaucratic government.

Mr. Chairman, the amazing predicament in which we find ourselves today calls for immediate remedial action. The President of the United States, in view of this serious situation, should forthwith demand the resignation of the entire Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bender].

NEW HIGH REACHED IN FEDERAL PAY ROLL, EXCEEDING WARTIME MARK

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, deeper grows the Roosevelt recession. Higher mounts the Federal pay roll. Greater becomes the national debt. Today there are more people working for Uncle Sam—exclusive of the Army, Navy, and relief rolls—than there ever has been in our history.

On January 1, 1939, the civil workers of the executive departments of the Federal Government reached the all-time high mark of 918,861. In wartime, on November 11, 1918, when the armistice terminating the World War was signed, there were only 917,760 Federal civil employees on the Government pay roll.

The staggering size of this figure can be appreciated when we discover that in the typical State of Iowa the last census revealed only 912,835 people employed in all types of enterprise combined. More men and women are working for our Government today than are employed in farming, manufacturing, storekeeping, and mining in one of the greatest States of the Union.

Our pay-roll records are still more staggering. As of December 1938 our almost 1,000,000 Federal employees drew $142,064,975 per month from the National Treasury. On January 1, 1934, the monthly Federal pay roll was only $77.838.000.

A comparative listing of civil employees in the executive branch of the Federal Government illustrates the mushroom growth of the public pay roll:

Civil employees

	June 30, 1916	438, 057
ì	Nov. 11, 1918 (wartime peak)	917, 760
	July 31, 1920	691, 116
	Dec. 31, 1922	510, 233
	Feb. 28, 1933 (New Deal begins)	563, 487
	June 30, 1933	572,091
	June 30, 1938	855, 131
	Jan. 1, 1939 (all-time record)	918,861

To those who assert that the tremendous expansion of the national pay roll has been due to the growth of emergency agencies, the figures furnish a conclusive answer. In the course of 6 years the normal departments of the Nation have increased their roster from 542,918 to 749,676.

Department	Dec. 31, 1932	Mar. 1 1939
Post Office War (civil rolls only). Agriculture. Navy (civil rolls only). Treasury. Interior Veterans' Administration General Accounting Office. Reconstruction Finance Corporation Civil Service Commission Federal Communications Commission Federal Power Commission Federal Reserve Board	273, 583 53, 343 26, 371 46, 936 52, 043 14, 483 34, 111 1, 974 1, 948 623 257 55 208	291, 901 97, 052 85, 610 77, 064 68, 559 46, 764 36, 371 4, 730 3, 894 1, 601 619 597 427

Combined with minor changes in the Departments of Commerce, Justice, Labor, and State, the totals are:

For Dec. 31,	1932	542, 918
For Mar. 1.	1939	749, 676

In the 66 new agencies created since 1933, 91,705 Federal workers now labor for the National Government.

Today, with all this amazing expansion, the bureaucracy which has grown up in Washington occupies 107 buildings in the Nation's Capital, with 4 more under construction today.

To be sure, the huge army of Federal employees does not account for the almost incredible increase in our national debt, but it throws some light on the obstacles to its reduction. No man or woman willingly relinquishes a job out of loyalty to the national debt. The vast increase in the number of our employees will be difficult to check. Many experts on administration are convinced that the Federal pay roll is on a run-away streak, which can be stopped only by a complete change of political leadership.

That change may be close at hand. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gifford].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I thought that probably there would be time for some debate this afternoon, and if the opportunity came I stated I would be willing to use a few moments. However, I do not believe I can get this audience properly interested in 7 minutes. I think this is a real opportunity to say something about the Department of Commerce, and, although we may not very greatly object to an Under Secretary, if it will be helpful, this seems to be a good time to make some comment on the conduct of that Department.

I was greatly interested the other day, after the chamber of commerce met in Washington, to read a comment made by the present Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hopkins:

After criticizing the chamber meeting, Hopkins added a final taunt by saying: "I do not want to overemphasize the meeting of the chamber of commerce. I do not think the members of the chamber of commerce for a moment represent the views of most businessmen of the country."

That from the head of the Department of Commerce. Yes, from the head of that Department which at the present moment is depended upon to bring about greater confidence to businessmen. How reassuring!

I wish that the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who favors this position of Under Secretary of Commerce, could have had some inkling of the type of man who will be appointed to fill the position of Secretary if he became ill or was away for any period of time. Is he to be a Corcoran appointee?

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.
Mr. LEA. Did the gentleman not hear the statement I made as to who would receive the appointment?

Mr. GIFFORD. I am sorry. I was not here. I was at a committee meeting.

Mr. LEA. I spoke for some minutes on that subject. The gentleman who will receive the appointment is Mr. Noble, head of the Civil Aeronautics Authority for several months, since its creation and until recently. He is a businessman of wide experience.

Mr. GIFFORD. I feel greatly relieved. I have great confidence in the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from California, and in his ability and judgment. If he thinks this gentleman is satisfactory, I feel reassured, because the present head of the Department of Commerce is not at all satisfactory to me. I think it was the greatest accident, the worst appointment, that under the present condition of government and of business that could possibly have been made. For 6 long years we have known him. For 6 long years he has abused businessmen. He has made use of most dreadful accusations of the businessmen of the country and has indulged in many sarcastic wisecracks. Like his chief, "he welcomes their hatred." Certainly no confidence whatever can be restored by such an appointment. If an Under Secretary will serve to counterbalance that influence, I am very glad to vote for

I have had opportunity recently to talk with many businessmen. There is no pretense at the moment of any return of confidence on their part, nor do they dare to proceed. The Securities and Exchange Commission, after promising cooperation and help for a short time, has also failed utterly to make such advances. The Secretary of Commerce has been ill for some time. We have to excuse that. But from the time promises were made some months ago until the present there has been no fulfillment of any promises from either of those two great branches of our Government. Business is still just as much in the dark, if not more so, than ever before.

The members of the chambers of commerce from the entire country came to Washington and stated their problems. If such taunts are to be heard from the Department of Commerce, we have but little hope. I listened carefully to the President when he addressed the retailers' convention. I usually take those speeches with a great deal of equanimity, but when I listened to that speech I was greatly aroused. He said in substance, "I am one of you. I am also a retailer. I will see that Government money passes over your counters and that you will hear it rattle just so long as it is necessary for the retailers to do business."

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes. That is why I am speaking—to arouse some interest.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman has interested me. The gentleman seems to know a great deal about Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ought to.

Mr. MOTT. In that regard I think the gentleman has an advantage over nearly every Member of the House. If he will look in the Congressional Directory, he will find no biography of Mr. Hopkins. Nobody seems to know what this man was before he came into the Government service. Can the gentleman enlighten the Members of Congress?

Mr. GIFFORD. He was a social worker. We all know that. We ought to know much about him by this time. I have been the ranking minority member of the Committee on Expenditures for the last 6 years, and I have constantly taken the floor to speak in reference to Mr. Hopkins. He has been under examination at various times, and I feel I am somewhat acquainted with his methods. He has a ready tongue. He is often most sarcastic. It is also stated that he loves the races. Probably this new Under Secretary may advise him how to make his bets at the races. He has a many-sided personality. I have often said about personalities that I hope I will never know them too well personally, lest I like them and forget what they have done against the public interest.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I stated, I take the floor at this time to invite discussion. I know so well by this time how appreciative the Members on the majority side of this House are when a member of the minority will speak their minds for them. They cannot do it themselves and be loyal to the administration. They would like to criticize but they are forced to keep silent. They approach me privately and tell me how fearful they are about the road we are traveling. They are glad indeed to have somebody over here speak the real truth, so that I take this opportunity to speak for them. They know I rather enjoy doing it.

The Committee on Banking and Currency is meeting daily and listening to more and more experimental demands. Over in another branch today they are talking about insured loans to business. Pour out and still pour out the Federal funds and the Federal credit. Every one of us knows where that leads. You so-called Democrats are just as worried, and more worried, than I, because when the roll is called I can say I was not to blame. You will have to take all the blame.

I said to the students of a large high school last week that we have wonderful confidence in the boys and girls of these days. "You have wonderful schools and are having wonderful training. I can prove to you that the Congress of the United States has remarkable and full confidence in you, because we are piling up a debt of $50,000,000,000, believing that you are to be willing and competent to pay it." [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this addition of personnel to our Federal pay roll. It is a most anomalous thing that Congressmen should stand up here and say we want to create another political job, that of Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce, to help business. The Government or Congress, by destroying our money institution, overtaxation, and every harassment that political ingenuity can conceive, cuts the arms and legs off of business and then says to it, "Now run."

Having, with the sovereign power of political machinery, destroyed business, we now propose by enlarging such power, to revive it. If we really want to cure this depression, let us abolish political jobs, boards, and bureaus, not increase them. You know this is necessary as well as I do. The more we build these bureaus, the more we add to them, the higher will become our tax burden, which is crushing and destroying our industry.

The very idea that this Congress should propose the addition of any personnel to our Federal pay roll when we do not have a penny to pay for the cost! Aye, when we have to borrow the money and mortgage our children and grand-children to meet it. Yet we continue, day in and day out, uninterruptedly, to follow this destructive course.

I wish to say to the Members of the Republican side that I believe it is time, and high time, that we take a definite stand on this spending question. If we are going to stop spending and save our Nation from bankruptcy and ruin we must stop. We must take a stand, stick to it, and be consistent.

A very spurious reason has been advanced here in support of this measure. It has been stated that the man selected to fill this position of Under Secretary of Commerce, should the same be created, is more capable than the present Secretary, that therefore he would be a valuable addition to the Department of Commerce. As though the Under Secretary would be giving orders to the Secretary.

I am certain the folks back home do not want us to create this or any other new political jobs. They want us, above everything else, to put a stop to this spending. They want us to stop adding to the horrible bureaucracy that is eating the lifeblood out of our people and our country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I had some apprehensions about our public debt and this orgy of spending until I was present at the meeting of the retail merchants a few nights ago and heard the President say that it did not matter how much we owed because we owed it to ourselves, and that it did not matter if posterity did have to pay it, because they would be paying it to themselves. Then I ceased to worry about it. What does the gentleman think about the sanity of that proposition?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I do not think there is any sanity to it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Culkin].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to sound a somewhat different note than some of the distinguished gentlemen on my own side who have spoken on this measure. To my mind, this measure means that the business of the United States, representing an investment of some $400,000,000,000, will have a friend at court. The distinguished occupant of the White House has from time to time promised appearement of business. He has promised breathing spells to business. But, to my mind, this is the first substantial, concrete step in that direction. The appointment of Edward J. Noble to this post, which has been promised, and the promise corroborated by the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. Lee], will bring into this important office a man who knows American business. He is the first appointee of this administration who, to my mind, has a wholehearted belief in the profit motive. Mr. Noble is a self-made man. He worked his way through Yale. He made his mark in the business world. He is a genuine realist, as are all bona fide northern New Yorkers. What America wants today, as the chairman of this committee has said, is a contact man in the Government who speaks the language of business and who understands what is back of business enterprise, what are its desires, and what are its needs. Mr. Noble was a brilliant success in the field of civil aeronautics. He was called to his present post by Mr. Hopkins. Mr. Hopkins, it is true, does lack business experience. Noble supplies it. Hopkins has the ear of the President. Noble will have the ear of Hopkins. At least, there is a life line for America's business in this situation. I believe this measure means a definite rapprochement, a definite attempt at business appearement. As far as I am concerned, I am going to support the bill, and urge the House to do likewise. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there are just a few matters I should like to call to the attention of the committee to show the practical value of having an Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce.

In the first place, having an Under Secretary makes that Department comparable with other important departments of the Government. In case of the death of the Secretary the Under Secretary would continue until the successor of the Secretary was appointed, and there would be no interruption in the work of the Department. In addition, the Under Secretary would materially strengthen the supervision over the bureaus, divisions, and the employees of the Department. He would have the legal right to represent and to speak for the head of the Department. He would be more distinctly in the position of an executive head and not merely an administrative or ministerial officer.

He would be in a position of rightful, recognized leadership in successful administration of the Department.

In conclusion, I wish to say just a word to our Republican friends. If there is any bill that may come up that deserves the unanimous support of the House, especially of the Members who believe in promoting better business conditions in this country, this bill is the one. I compliment the gentleman from New York who has just spoken on the nonpartisan manner in which he presented this question to the House.

I appreciate that attitude and the country ought to appreciate such an attitude in respect of the important problems now before us. As I said earlier in this discussion, in my judgment, there is no more important problem confronting the American people right now than to put idle men and idle money to work, and this appointment has that as its primary purpose, in addition to the other matters I have mentioned. Its purpose is to provide experienced, able, practical business leadership in attempting to solve one of our most acute problems.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I shall direct my remarks to one phase of foreign commerce which was referred to in the remarks of the Secretary of Commerce of May 25 before the New York Foreign Trade Week Committee. At that time Secretary Hopkins had considerable to say with reference to our trade with Latin-American countries, and quoting directly from his speech, he said:

We will, in my judgment, have to follow more generally the line taken by some of our more progressive foreign traders and modify our views and point of view as to the way in which we can join hands with our sister republics in seeking a higher economic ground for all of us.

The Secretary also observed:

Nevertheless I believe that as we look into the future we should envisage a policy directed toward encouraging domestic management for the fulfillment of the good-neighbor policy.

The Secretary also further observed:

There can be a type of scramble for world trade which in itself acts as a constant source of irritation and threat to good will among nations.

In looking over his remarks I find he estimates there are some 115,000,000 souls south of the Rio Grande, and he thinks, perhaps, we can stimulate our foreign trade in a manner whereby the workers of America can greatly contribute to an increase in the standard of living of those people as well as the 130,000,000 people in the United States.

Brazil, in South America, has, in recent years, become a great cotton-producing country. Only a few years ago it was exporting something like 2,300 bales of cotton. This year their exports will probably jump to 1,500,000 bales, or perhaps 2,000,000 bales, provided the scramble for world trade which has been referred to by Secretary Hopkins does not double-cross the Brazilian people and at the same time tend to wreck the good-neighbor relationship between the United States and the Latin-American countries.

As an illustration of our cotton situation as between the United States and Brazil, which has to do with the goodneighbor policy, as well as with some other countries, let me submit these statistics of May 22, 1939.

Evidence continues to accumulate that the holding of most of the supply of American cotton in the Government loan stock for prices above levels competitive with prices of foreign growths is progressively destroying foreign markets for the American staple.

During the month of April British mills took only 73,000 bales of American cotton, compared with 78,000 in the same month last season, but they took 189,000 bales of foreign growths compared with only 110,000 in April last season. Their taking of American cotton constituted only 28 percent of their taking of all cottons in April of this year, compared with 41 percent in April of last year.

During the first 9 months of the current cotton season, from August 1 to April 30, the United States exported only 2,977,000 bales of cotton, compared with 5,066,000 in the same portion of last season, but India exported 2,233,000 bales compared with 1,485,000 bales. British spinners recently appealed to the United States Government for the release of loan cotton.

In this connection, the Commodity Credit Corporation has control of something like 11,500,000 bales of cotton, and the statisticians indicate that by August 1 of this year that stock will probably move up to around 14,000,000 bales.

Now, going back to the recommendations of the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hopkins, with reference to the world scramble for trade, it appears that Secretary of Agriculture Wallace is very aggressively promoting a program of subsidizing exports of cotton, and, as I comprehend the situation, that runs directly contrary to what Secretary Hopkins has to say. Certainly, if we start out to subsidize the exports of cotton, that brings us into a head-on collision with Brazil, a cotton-exporting country, which is in no position to subsidize its exports of cotton, and therefore double-crosses or greatly interferes with the recommendations which have been made in this speech within the last few days by Secretary of Commerce Hopkins.

So, in considering this bill it seems to me that perhaps one of the most constructive things Congress can do, if it is within the power of Congress, is not in enacting a piece of legislation of this kind, but in bringing the Secretaries of Commerce and of Agriculture together, so that their views will run consistently, and in that way perhaps we can hold more of the foreign trade we now enjoy than we will otherwise, and perhaps recover some of that which we have lost.

I have just found from the Wednesday, May 31, Daily News Record this interesting advertisement, full page, carried by the Continental Mills, Inc., of Philadelphia, in which they say:

In this day of international pandemonium when our ears are deafened by challenges and counter cries abroad, it is not surprising to find many among us unresponsive to the plea of our own country.

America is still in need. She is still weathering a 10-year-old depression. Millions of her people are still unemployed. Poverty is prevalent aplenty. Our farms and our factories are sparsely utilized. Our natural and scientific resources are meagerly employed. Taxation continues to mount as relief and subsidy multiply. The American standard of living is jeopardized.

Despite the enforced limitation of our productive operations to a subnormal schedule, we are importing more farm produce and more manufactured products than ever before in our history.

The ad sets forth many other strong statements relative to our internal conditions which I shall not quote at this moment.

Now, when conditions are such that advertisements of that type, full-page spread, are carried by the large manufacturing concerns of the country, it certainly deserves the attention of our people to look closely into the workings of these great departments of government, whether it be commerce or agriculture. I shall not support this bill, because I feel that at the present time the Department of Commerce is amply implemented with personnel to do constructive things if they desire to do them. It seems to me that introducing an Under Secretary at this time will tend to further confuse and complicate and interfere with such policies as the Department of Commerce may have.

I sat in the Senate hearings and listened to the recommendations made of Mr. Hopkins, prior to his confirmation by the Senate. I heard the big giants of industry praise his abilities and speak of the great effect they thought would immediately follow his appointment as Secretary of Commerce. Today I sat in the Senate hearings and listened to Jerome Frank tell about what he thinks is necessary in order to stimulate the production of goods and brings about increased employment in this country. Certainly his views have no connection whatsoever with further implementation such as is presented by this bill. So it seems to me that we here on this floor could do a more constructive job if we would bring these departments closer together in the formulation of sound and sane policies than by enacting legislation such as this.

Mr. Chairman, in no way do I wish to minimize the importance of the Department of Commerce. Indeed, it is an important branch of government. The Secretary of Commerce holds a most important position of trust and responsibility. The country could well use the services of someone with a broad understanding and a lot of practical experience in commerce from the simple activities up to the complicated operations of the large mass-producing units. I sincerely regret that in this dark hour of our economic existence we are without a Secretary of wide experience so that he might more ably direct the ship of commerce for our people. But we face the reality of having as head of this great Department a man without practical experience. It is true he has had a vast experience in social work and he, no doubt, is well schooled in the theory and practice of rendering social aid to those who are without employment. But we have our Social Security Board and other branches of government along with the W. P. A. and the P. W. A. and also the C. C. C. We should have at the head of the Commerce Department men of great practical experience—not men who know all the solutions, but men who can find the solutions to our commercial problems. In that manner we could bring back into employment millions of workers who are now dependent upon some kind of Government relief. Placing them back in the group of the employed would make their bread sweeter to They would be a happier group; their lives would be much fuller and their souls would more completely respond to life itself if they could only "make their own way" through their own individual efforts. A man trained in industrial pursuits would no doubt more fully appreciate these truths than one schooled in the theory and practice of rendering social uplift by means of dollars drawn from the Public Treasury. The field of poetry is very good, but it should come after individual accomplishment has shown results in the shop of reality. Individual initiative and self-enterprise put the mind and body of a man in a more receptive mood for the finer things of life.

I am told of an Italian immigrant by the name of Mario Izzo who resided at Aliquippa, Pa., who came to America late in life and quickly learned the fundamental philosophy of America. This Italian immigrant was forced on relief, and I am told that while in that situation was accidentally burned to death and was buried in the potter's field. The story runs along to the effect that after his burial the citizens of Aliquippa began to appreciate the value of the life of this immigrant, raised a fund, had his body exhumed, gave him a church funeral, which was attended by hundreds of people, and today are raising funds for a memorial. While on relief Mario Izzo, acting as a volunteer, swept the streets of the town 6 hours a day and 6 days in a week. He said, "You see they give me money to live. So I keep this town clean like a table. It makes my bread taste sweeter. I feel like a man because I work."

O Mr. Chairman, if our Secretary of Commerce could only grasp the full meaning of the words of this great Italian immigrant. The American democracy has always contended that there was dignity and honor in work and in commercethe satisfaction of a job well done and a product well made. All over this land there are millions of unemployed American citizens begging and praying for a chance to work so that their bread will taste sweet. I grow so weary listening to the talk which is unfriendly to industry: Considering plans which create more hazards for those who would adventure in their efforts to create jobs that men might work. If the Department of Commerce could once more fully comprehend that unless there is industry, and much more than at present, that our standard of living must necessarily drop below what it now is, perhaps it would then lend greater assistance and be more friendly to those engaged in industrial

Monday, June 5, 1939

Rev. Dr. Francis Yarnall, vicar, Chapel of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our help is in the name of the Lord, who hath made heaven and earth; blessed be the name of the Lord henceforth, world without end. Lord, hear our prayer and let our cry come unto Thee.

Lord of power and giver of grace and wisdom, we commend to Thee all who are engaged in the government of this our country. Grant to them an undeviating purpose, pure hearts, and unfailing devotion to the cause of righteousness. To Thee, merciful Lord, we commend their work, praying that it may be such as will promote Thy cause in our midst, to the succor of the poor, the relief of the oppressed, the putting down of all social evils, and the redress of all social wrongs. Let all they think or say or do be for Thy glory and the good of Thy people, that, in tranquillity, Thy kingdom may go forward till all the earth be filled with the knowledge of Thy love even as the waters cover the sea. All which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Assembly Joint Resolution 46

Relative to civil-liberties investigation

Whereas a subcommittee of the United States Senate Committee on Education and Labor was authorized to investigate violations of civil rights in California and other Western States; and

Whereas the subcommittee initiated the investigation but was unable to complete it because of a lack of funds; and

Whereas there has been a widespread public demand for the continuance of the investigation as evidenced by action taken by such organizations, as the National Grange, the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and others urging an appropriation of additional funds for the use of the subcommittee; and

Whereas the Associated Farmers of California, Inc., in a telegram to Senator Hiram Johnson, dated April 4, 1939, inserted in the Congressional Record on that date, demanded an opportunity to be heard before the subcommittee in respect to charges made against it; and

Whereas Senators Schwellenbach and Downey have introduced Senate Resolution 126 in the Seventy-sixth Congress, providing for an appropriation of $100,000 for use in enabling the subcommittee to continue its investigation; and

Whereas Gov. Culbert L. Olson has already communicated with the chairman of the United States Senate Audit and Control Committee, Senator Byrnes, to support Senate Resolution 126: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That this legislature approves of and endorses Senate Resolution 126, now pending in the Seventy-sixth Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent by the chief clerk of the assembly to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and to each Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and to Senator JAMES BYRNES, chairman of the United States Senate Audit and Control Committee.

House Memorial 11

Memorial to the Congress of the United States requesting the increase of the wage scale of employees of the Works Progress Administration in the State of Florida

Whereas the wage scale for employees of the Works Progress Administration in the State of Florida is not sufficient to provide such employees and their families with proper and adequate food, housing, and medical attention; and

Whereas the low wages paid employees of the Works Progress Administration have the effect of bringing the wages in private employment down to their level; and

Whereas the Works Progress Administration pays much higher wages in other States, particularly in the North: Now, therefore,

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That the Congress of the United States of America is hereby respectfully petitioned and requested to enact laws providing for an increase in the scale of wages paid to employees of the Works Progress Administration in the State of Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following senate resolution of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolution relative to the construction and maintenance of a veterans' general facility and hospital in Humboldt County

Whereas the veterans in the northwestern portion of California and the southern portion of Oregon (Del Norte, Humboldt, Mendocino, Lake, Siskiyou, Trinity, Shasta, and Tehama Counties in California, and Curry and Josephine Counties in Oregon) find it ever-increasingly difficult to obtain hospitalization benefits under the regulations of the Veterans' Administration of the Federal Gov-ernment for the approximately 10,000 ex-service men living in said area; and

Whereas these conditions reflect conditions prevailing generally throughout the State of California; and

Whereas this territory is of rough, mountainous terrain with inadequate transportation facilities consisting of two primary State highway roads and two railroads, running northerly and southerly near the eastern and western boundaries of the area, and second-ary roads connecting these primary roads traverse the mountainous area between; and

Whereas the present veterans' facilities and hospitals are not to assure the construction and maintenance of a veterans' general facility and hospital in Humboldt County in the State of California; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, properly endorsed by the secretary of the senate, be forwarded to the President of the United States, Vice President of the United States, Speaker of the House of Representatives, each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives from the State of California, and to the Veterans' Bureau, Washington, D. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

Whereas the admission of aliens to the United States and the deportation thereof are matters entirely under Federal control and not subject to modification by the State of New York; and

Whereas the Federal Government assumes no responsibility for aliens who become public charges unless the incapacity develops within 5 years after entry into the United States and then only if the disability is due to causes which existed prior to landing, and then only to the extent of endeavoring to deport the alien; and then only to the extent of endeavoring to deport the alien; and Whereas notwithstanding earnest efforts by the United States to exclude persons likely to become public charges, many aliens have to be supported by the State of New York; and Whereas often aliens cannot or should not be returned to the country from which they came; and Whereas a grievous burden is therefore placed upon the individual States which is particularly heavy in New York State because of the importance of New York City as a port of entry and the fact that aliens tend to settle near the port at which they disembarked; and

Resolved (if the assembly concurs), That the people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, hereby petition the Congress of the United States to recognize the responsibility of the Federal Government for hospitalization of the alien insane and defective and to take appropriate action to this end; and be it further Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be urged to give serious consideration to the advisability of authorizing deportation of aliens who may become public charges even though such aliens shall have been in the United States for more than 5 years; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, and to the Secretary of the Senate and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of Congress, and to each United States Senator from the State of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Assembly Joint Resolution 13

Relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation limiting the number of cars in trains

Whereas there are a number of bills pending in the Congress of the United States which propose to limit the number of cars that may be used in any one train; and

Whereas the need for legislation of this character has long been recognized by patrons and by people familiar with the operation and management of trains; and

Whereas the elimination of trains of excessive length would tend to meet the needs of present day shippers for faster and more frequent service; return to the carrier by rail much of the business now going to their competitors; and promote a greater degree of safety to patrons, employees, and the general public through a relative increase of air-brake efficiency and the elimination of excessive slack action; and

Whereas many States proposed to, and some have, enacted legislation limiting the number of cars which may be included in any one train; and

Whereas the Federal courts have indicated that power to enact such legislation, designed for the safety and comfort of passengers, such legislation, designed for the safety and comfort of passengers,
such legislation, designed for the safety and comfort of passengers, such legislation, designed for the safety and comfort of passengers, employees, and persons working on trains, is vested exclusively in the Congress of the United States, thereby giving new force to the need for Federal action in this matter: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly. That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully urged to enact legislation limiting the number of cars which may be used in any one train; and be it further.

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation. such legislation.

The statement presented by Mr. Wheeler is as follows:

This bill is designed to meet a pressing problem, namely, keeping deserving farmers upon the farm.

While there are many grave problems that face this Nation, both nationally and internationally, none go to the very root of our economic troubles more than that of adjusting the debt structure economic troubles more than that of adjusting the debt structure—and particularly the debt structure of the farmer, who, because of the long-continued low price of agricultural products, cannot meet his fixed obligations, and as a result thereof are losing their farms. Regardless of whatever may be said, the farmer is the backbone of this country. It is he that produces the foodstuffs and clothing. It is his purchasing power that makes it possible to open up the shop and the factory and put men to work.

If he is forced to leave the farm and forced into the city, he adds to the unemployed and to the relief load.

The bill provides that in the event of Federal land-bank fore-closure, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation would pay the Federal land bank. When this is done the farmer will be given 5 years during which he will occupy his farm without fear of eviction and under a landlord-tenant relationship. During the 5 years the economy of the particular farm would be studied and then, based on this information, there would be a reappraisement by a county committee, whose findings and conclusions would be subject to review and change by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The bill likewise provides a means to scale down the farmers' production loans to a point within his ability to pay them.

I shall seek early consideration of this legislation and will press for its enactment during this Congress.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I object to the conference report and wish to be heard on it. May I inquire whether the Senator from Utah has explained the report? Has an explanation of it been offered?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, an explanation of the conference report appears on page 6503 of the Congres-SIONAL RECORD. There was some discussion on Thursday in regard to the conference report, and a request was made that it be allowed to go over until today.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. I had the opportunity of reading, and did read, the RECORD on that point. I understand that the conferees have restored the sum of $100,000,000 by way of authorization.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senate passed the bill with an authorization of $40,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. Has there come to the Senator's notice an article which appeared in the Washington Post of Sunday, June 4, charging in terms not only that the President did not sponsor this particular measure but, in addition, that it was being pushed by and was a bill representing American manganese interests, which were seeking subsidies by way of use of Government funds to develop mines in this country?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I read that article yesterday, and I was interested in some of the deductions made.

The writer of the article was, of course, unfamiliar with the 3 years' hearings which have been going on in regard to the bill. He evidently knew nothing about the governmental reports on the bill. He has merely a superficial knowledge about the purposes of the bill. He evidently has no knowledge at all about the dual way in which the bill will operate.

So far as the President is concerned, of course our committee received no communication from the President of the United States with regard to the bill; but it received communications from every one of the executive departments interested in the bill. So far as the bill is concerned, it is not, as the Senator has suggested, in any sense a bill brought into existence to accomplish any purpose except a really patriotic one.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator has stated that the writer. of the article was misinformed in certain particulars. Will the Senator state whether or not the plan to encourage the further development of mines and certain mineral deposits in this country, under the assumed intention of acquiring stocks of strategic materials, is in fact representative of the demands of the mining interests?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Of course no one knows what are the demands of the mining interests, but, coming as I do from a mining State, and not having been able in the course of 3 years, to arouse any interest in this bill, so far as my mining constituents are concerned, I believe I can say with all truthfulness that there was no mining lobby in connection with it.

As the Senator knows, several bills have been introduced in the Congress for the purpose of bringing about the use of one particular strategic metal, namely, manganese. There may be some justification for the statement that persons interested in manganese might be concerned in the enactment of the pending bill and in the development of their industry, which may be sponsored under the proposed law. But, as the Senator knows, if the United States can produce its own manganese, it will bring about something extremely advantageous to the industrial, the strategic, and the military welfare of our country, and anxiety on the part of anyone who imagines that any group has been able to accomplish something different than would have been accomplished under the ordinary processes of government is certainly not well founded.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. I move that the conference report be rejected, and that the conferees be instructed to adhere to the bill as it passed the Senate, which called for an appropriation of $40,000,000. I wish to be heard briefly in support of the motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation for the benefit of the Senator from Connecticut. The parliamentary situation with reference to the report is that if the Senate does not like the report the Senate can vote it down. The motion the Senator makes is not in order at the present moment. Whether the Senate wants to adopt the report or reject it, the question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. DANAHER. Pursuant to the statement of the Vice President with reference to the parliamentary situation, I shall address myself merely to the motion of the Senator in charge of the bill, that the report be accepted. I ask that it be rejected.

Mr. President, at the time the bill was before the Senate there was discussion on the floor in reference to the language which appears in the first section of the bill, which would authorize an appropriation to encourage the further development of mines and deposits of certain materials in the United States. So far as the announced purpose of the bill is concerned, that it is to provide for acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to our national needs, no one can quarrel with that, I am sure. Pursuant to that announcement, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] moved that the authorization be limited to $40,-000,000. The Senate at that time approved the amendment offered from the floor by the Senator from South Carolina.

We now find that, with that language in the bill, a group of authorities in the War and Navy Departments apparently is to be given carte blanche to undertake to encourage the further development of mines by the use of Government subsidies, and with that thought in mind the House of Representatives, passing the authorization of $100,000,000 in the first place, finds itself at odds with us, or we find ourselves at odds with them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator say that the conference report contains matter which is in neither bill?

Mr. DANAHER. I understand that the conference report contains matter which was in each bill, the bill from the House and the bill from the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. In both bills.
Mr. DANAHER. In both bills. When we are undertaking in this fashion to accept a bill which has been brought in by the conferees in contravention of the vote we previously took, I believe we are asked to authorize the expenditure of Government money for uses not contemplated in the announced purpose of the bill. I believe that the conference report should be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

ORDER TO DISPENSE WITH CALL OF THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The consideration of measures on the calendar under rule VIII is now in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5610, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5610) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I wish to make a short statement in respect to the bill. As passed by the House, the bill contained a total appropriation of $46,915,207. To that amount there has been added by the Senate $2,257,778, the amount of the bill as reported to the Senate being $49,172,985.

The amount of the regular and supplemental estimates for 1940 was $48,015,860. The amount of the appropriations for 1939 was $48,266,052.

The bill as reported to the Senate exceeds the estimates for 1940 by $1,157,125. It exceeds the appropriation for 1939 by $806.933.

The total appropriation in the bill as passed by the House is under the appropriation made for 1939 by $1,450,875.

Mr. President, the principal increases relate to the few items I will present to the Senate in a general way. One of the first items to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate is an increase for the department of inspections, the sum of $37,820. The principal item in this increase relates to the electrical inspection division, for which an increase is made in the sum of $30,140. The committee found that the electrical inspections in the District had been very sadly neglected, it appearing that the division is about 50 percent behind, and there will be required not only the addition of a few permanent employees but some temporary employees also will be needed for a period of 3 years in order that the inspections may be made current.

The House of Representatives provided that the public playgrounds should be merged under the Board of Education; in other words, that the Board of Education should have complete jurisdiction not only of the community centers and the public-school playgrounds, but also of the public playgrounds of the District. The Senate committee considered that that was inadvisable and, therefore, retained the jurisdiction of the public playgrounds in the public playgrounds department, and the appropriations recommended therefor correspond with the appropriations made in the 1939 appropriation bill.

In reference to schools, the total increase is $1,049,697. One of the principal items is the provision for additional teachers for the Banneker Junior High School and the Phelps Vocational School, amounting to $43,380. The Banneker Junior High School is about to be completed. It will be finished by the 1st of September, in time to open classes in that high-school building when the schools resume sessions in the fall. The House failed to provide for any teaching staff for that high school, and, therefore, it was necessary for us to make provision in order that there might be a proper staff of teachers for the Banneker High School.

The committee added $25,000 to the appropriation for fuel, gas, electric light, and power for the schools, the House providing an appropriation of $300,000. That was the amount of the appropriation made last year, but it had to be supplemented in a deficiency appropriation, and the Senate felt that, rather than have the school children run the hazard of not having the school buildings properly warmed during the winter period and properly lighted, it would be best to add the $25,000 which the record indicates would be the proper amount.

The Senate committee also struck out a provision contained in the House bill to the effect that the appropriation should be so proportioned and distributed over the next fiscal year, and so administered, that the total amount to be utilized during the fiscal year would not exceed the appropriation of $300,000 made by the House. The committee felt that considerable difficulties would be encountered were we to charge the school authorities with such an approtionment of that appropriation.

The committee made an investigation of the school buildings in the District. It found that there are quite a number of them, something over 40, according to my recollection, which are over 40 years of age. They are obsolete and archaic, and wholly unfit for the purposes of instruction and education.

The committee came to the conclusion that now was the proper time to begin a program of reconstruction of these old school buildings. The Congress several years ago provided for a program of reconstruction of these school buildings but nothing has been done about it up to the present time. The Senate committee came to the conclusion that the proper thing to do was to provide a program of replacement and of consolidation, and not to authorize any construction unless both of those factors were included. Therefore, it made provision for the construction of the Ketchum School eight-room addition, which will not only take care of the needs of the present Ketchum School but will also replace the Van Buren School and the Van Buren Annex. It also provided for three 24-room buildings and one 16-room building to replace existing schools and to consolidate three schools in one.

The House inserted a provision in the bill in reference to the Fire Department to the effect that any vacancies occurring during the next fiscal year should not be filled. The Senate committee came to the conclusion that that was not a wise provision, because if it became the law then if the chief of the Fire Department should resign, or should die, or for any reason be unable to fill the office, there would be no chief of the Fire Department. If an epidemic were to occur, or if for any cause there should be a large number of removals from the personnel of the Fire Department, the places could not be filled, and the Fire Department force would be seriously crippled.

The Senate committee, after careful consideration, increased the appropriation for general relief in the sum of $600,000, providing that not to exceed $300,000 should be used for unemployed employables. The record shows that there are approximately 9,000 unemployed employables in the District of Columbia—people who have been certified for W. P. A. rolls but are unable to get upon the rolls on account of inadequate appropriations for that purpose. Only a negligible sum has been used to provide for any of the unemployed employables in the District of Columbia. Therefore, the Senate committee came to the conclusion that we should make a modest appropriation with respect to that class of unfortunates and to provide that not to exceed $300,000 should be devoted to that purpose.

The items I have mentioned represent the main items of increase made by the Senate Appropriations Committee.

I ask that the committee amendments be now acted upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. La Follette in the chair). The committee amendments will be stated in order. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "addition", to strike out "$5,000,000" and insert "$7,750,000", so as to read:

derived shall be credited wholly to the District of Columbia, and, in addition, $7,750,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be advanced July 1, 1939, and all of the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia, namely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee, in charge of the bill, what reasons, if any, the subcommittee or the full committee which adopted the amendment had for cutting the salary of the public health officer of the District of Columbia.

Mr. OVERTON. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will state that the facts in connection with this amendment are that the amendment was not considered in the subcomittee. The amendment had been proposed by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], proposing that the salary of the health officer be reduced by $1,000, and that the salary of his assistant be reduced by $1,000. Unfortunately, the senior Senator from Virginia was not present at the time the subcommittee marked up the bill, and we concluded to wait until he should appear before the full committee. When the full committee met the senior Senator from Virginia was still unable to be present. The amendment was proposed, and a majority of the full committee agreed to the amendment.

I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that back of the amendment is, first, the statement that the predecessor of the present health officer received a salary of $7,500. I have not been able to check upon the salary which had been previously paid, and, therefore, I do not know that that statement is correct; but the senior Senator from Virginia advises me that the present health officer is being paid more than his predecessor.

As the Senator from Wisconsin knows, under the administration of the present health officer there was considerable trouble with reference to Gallinger Hospital. Happily, all that trouble has been ended by an agreement which was entered into between the Commissioners and the health officer and the two universities. Under the new agreement matters are proceeding very nicely at Gallinger Hospital, and there is no more friction; but as a result of all this the suggestion was made that the salary be reduced.

In addition, let me say to the Senator that the senior Senator from Virginia also offered an amendment, which probably will be reoffered upon the floor in perhaps another form, that in addition to a reduction of the salary of the health officer and his assistant there should be a reduction in the salaries of the resident full-time physicians at Gallinger Hospital. The Senator probably will recall that at the last session Congress concluded to provide in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for five full-time resident physicians at salaries of $5,600 each. The senior Senator from Virginia has made a rather thorough investigation, and has come to the conclusion that the salaries paid resident physicians in comparable hospitals are in the neighborhood of $2,600 per annum; and therefore he has made the suggestion that either immediately, or at sometime during the coming fiscal year, the salaries of the full-time resident physicians also should be reduced. That matter was brought to the attention of the full committee, but no action was taken upon the amendment.

I have given the Senator from Wisconsin my understanding of the whole situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his explanation.

I wish to say at the outset that it has never been my privilege to serve on the Appropriations Committee or on the District of Columbia subcommittee, and so my knowledge of these matters is not as full as it should be. However, without attempting in any way to pass judgment upon the controversy which arose between the head of the Health Department in the District of Columbia and the deans of the medical schools, it seems to me this is a strange way to resolve any such controversy. If Dr. Ruhland—and I do not admit ithas been guilty of some error of judgment, or if he has been engaged in any sort of reprehensible conduct, the way to thresh out the matter would be to take proper proceedings for his removal. However, it seems to me to be entirely erroneous and ill-judged procedure for an appropriations committee of the Senate, upon the statement of any one Member, no matter how distinguished, that he felt some disciplinary action should be taken to follow such a course. It denies the person who is affected an opportunity to thresh out the issues which are involved in the situation. Furthermore, Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that Congress, which must bear a large share of the responsibility for the management and operation of this large community, can take no pride in the health statistics of the District of Columbia

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Johnson of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator states that no action should be taken toward the reduction of the salary of the health officer without giving him an opportunity to be heard upon the issue involved. In justice to the senior Senator from Virginia, I wish to say that the senior Senator from Virginia appeared before the subcommittee at the time Dr. Ruhland, the present health officer, appeared, and he interrogated Dr. Ruhland at length with reference to the controversy which had arisen between the two universities and the full-time resident physicians and Dr. Ruhland. Therefore, Dr. Ruhland had an opportunity to make a statement in reference thereto. Also, the senior Senator from Virginia called Dr. Ruhland's attention to a written statement which Dr. Ruhland had made which perhaps showed an unethical attitude on the part of the health officer toward the visiting staff of physicians. I mention that to show that Dr. Ruhland was given an opportunity to be heard on that issue.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, be that as it may, the fact remains that the subcommittee which heard the testimony was not sufficiently impressed to initiate on its own motion the disciplinary action which has been taken by the full committee with regard to Dr. Ruhland and his assistant.

As I have already stated, I am not prepared, because I have not had an opportunity to read the testimony, to pass judgment on this controversy; but I think that the Senate itself should not confirm the procedure proposed by the committee of taking disciplinary action against an officer by reducing his salary and at the same time permit him to remain in office, because some members of the Appropriations Committee did not approve of what the officer has done in a certain matter.

Gallinger Hospital, Mr. President, has been a starved institution. I venture the assertion that there is not a city of comparable size to Washington in the United States whose municipal hospital has such meager facilities and receives as little money; and yet here in the District of Columbia, which, in my opinion—and it has always been my view—should be a model community, the step which is taken in this case is, first, to reduce the salary of a public-health officer and his assistant; and, secondly, to reduce the salaries of doctors who are on duty in Gallinger Hospital. I protest such action, and I trust that the committee amendment will be rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the controversy in connection with Gallinger Hospital, and I have not read the testimony; but on request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], chairman of the committee, the language which appears in the committee amendment was inserted. The Senator from Virginia is ill and was not able to be present when the committee met and reported the bill. He will be on the conference committee, and, it seems to me, the amendment might well be taken to conference, where the matter can be threshed out.

In this connection I have been asked by the Senator from Virginia to offer an amendment on page 49—and I shall offer it later—concerning the other physicians at Gallinger Hospital. I think there would be no harm done by the Senate adopting the amendment now pending and also the amendment that I shall offer a little later, at the request of the Senator from Virginia, and let them go to conference, where all the testimony and all the facts will be available, and let the conferees work out the matter in conference.

I do not think the amendment reflects seriously on anybody. We have sometimes raised our own salaries; I do not recall that we ever reduced them; but there can be no reason why salaries may not be reduced. I think we owe it to the chairman of the committee, who has taken an active part in the matter and is familiar with all the facts, to adopt the amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a final word. There is no claim here, as I understand it, that this action was taken primarily on the basis of economy. This action was taken after the subcommittee had fully heard the testimony and taken no action as the result of that testimony. Then the bill went before the full committee, and the distinguished chairman of the full committee offered this amendment, and it was inserted in the bill. Everyone knows that if it goes to conference the action there will be a star-chamber proceeding, and Dr. Ruhland will have no opportunity to be present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Dr. Ruhland, as I understand, has already appeared, and his testimony will be before the conferees for the conferees to pass upon it. I do not think a conference is a "star-chamber proceeding"; it is never conducted in that way. The testimony of Dr. Ruhland will be before the conferees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The proceedings of conference committees of which the Senator has been a member may have been different from those of conference committees of which the Senator from Wisconsin has been a member.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will not be a member of the conference committee in this case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But we know that in relation to all the other items in the bill this one will be of minor consideration, and whatever the conference committee agrees upon will be brought back to the Senate, where it must be voted up or down without amendment.

Mr. President, if Dr. Ruhland is guilty of any act for which he should be condemned, if he has made any serious mistakes, it seems to me that this is not the way in which to try the case. I sincerely hope, I reiterate, that the Senate will reject this amendment. Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will uphold the amendment and let it go to conference, where it may be worked out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 45, beginning line 2. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I have not heard the amendment read. I do not understand what it is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators who came in as a result of the quorum call, I should like briefly to repeat what I have already said concerning this amendment. It is a committee amendment to be found on page 45 of the bill, and proposes to cut the salaries of the health officers and his assistant $1,000 each per annum.

The amendment grows out of a controversy which took place between Dr. Ruhland and two of the medical schools in the District of Columbia with regard to Gallinger Hospital. At the outset I stated that I have had no opportunity to read the testimony. I have had no opportunity to study the controversy, or to come to any conclusions about it. However, it was stated by the genial chairman of the subcommittee, in charge of the bill, that this matter was heard by the subcommittee, that the subcommittee took no action upon it, and that only when the matter reached the full committee was this amendment proposed and adopted by the full committee.

Mr. President, it is not claimed that this is a move in the direction of economy. It is frankly admitted that the amendment is proposed as a means of disiplinary action against the present health officer of the District of Columbia and his assistant. In all justice, I do not believe this is the appropriate way in which to discipline any person. Either Dr. Ruhland is competent to hold his position or he is not. If he is not competent, he should be removed. If he is competent, he should not be disciplined for some discretionary action which did not meet the approval of members of the Committee on Appropriations of the United States Senate.

The Senator from Louisiana has further frankly admitted that the Gallinger Hospital controversy has now been settled to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned, including the deans of the two local medical schools, Dr. Ruhland, and every other person who was a party to the controversy. The matter having been settled, nevertheless it is still proposed that Dr. Ruhland shall be disciplined by having his salary cut $1,000 per year, and that the salary of his assistant shall be cut the same amount. In all fairness, I do not think the Senate should approve such action in the premises.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, in the absence of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass], I wish to reiterate the position he has taken in reference to this matter.

First, it is his contention that Dr. Ruhland is receiving a salary in excess of the salary of his predecessor. Therefore, the logical deduction from that statement is that, in the opinion of the senior Senator from Virginia, Dr. Ruhland is receiving a salary in excess of the salary which his office should properly command.

I stated that the reason why the subcommittee took no action on the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Virginia was that he was absent at the time we were marking up the bill. We expected that he would be present at the full committee meeting, and that he could then present the whole subject to the full committee; but, as I have said, unfortunately he could not be present at the full committee meeting.

The Senator from Wisconsin takes the position that this amendment is intended as the imposition of a penalty upon Dr. Ruhland. I do not know that it is exactly susceptible of that construction.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. OVERTON. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Louisiana, in his very frank and complete statement in response to my first inquiry as to the justification for the amendment and my request that he should state what it grew out of, listed primarily the controversy at Gallinger Hospital as the reason for the amendment.

Mr. OVERTON. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On what other theory, then, can the amendment be justified excepting that it is a post facto disciplinary action? I cannot understand what else could be behind it.

Mr. OVERTON. That is very true. Still, I do not think the conclusion is inescapable that the purpose of the amendment is to inflict a penalty upon Dr. Ruhland. The conclusion is that by reason of his alleged maladministration of affairs at Gallinger Hospital he did not show that he was such a competent official as to entitle him to compensation over and above that of his predecessor.

Let me explain the matter for just a moment and then I will yield to the Senator.

In the Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1939 it was provided that there should be five resident physicians at Gallinger Hospital. The position taken by the senior Senator from Virginia is that, taking advantage of that provision. and contrary to the statute of Congress, the health officer placed those five resident physicians in a position of authority over the visiting staff; that the visiting staff had exercised authority with reference to various departments of Gallinger Hospital from the beginning, and that Dr. Ruhland disregarded the law and placed those physicians in the ascendency over the visiting staff; and he considered that that was not a proper course of action under the statute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Has the Senator from Louisiana, as chairman of the subcommittee, come to the conclusion, as a lawyer, that Dr. Ruhland had violated the law?

Mr. OVERTON. Let me state the answer of Dr. Ruhland. He said that he undertook to have these new appointees classified under the civil-service regulations, and that under the civil-service regulations they had to be classified, in order to get the $5,600 salary, in such a classification as to give them, as I understand, the authority which they did exercise.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator think there was any such flagrant violation of law that Dr. Ruhland's salary should be cut a thousand dollars a year and his assistant's salary cut a similar amount?

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator from Wisconsin has asked me a direct question and I will give him a very direct answer. I have the highest regard for Dr. Ruhland. I have been thrown in very slight contact with him. The most I have seen of him has been in his appearance before the committee. However, I have received reports from physicians in the city of Washington to the effect that he is a very conscientious official; that he is on the job at all times, and is very deserving. I am giving the Senator the position taken by the full committee and the proponents of the amendment. The Senator asked me for my personal opinion, and I am very glad to give it to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate the Senator's frank statement.

Mr. OVERTON. There is just one other contention I wish to answer on behalf of the senior Senator from Virginia. He gave Dr. Ruhland every opportunity to answer in respect to the charges which he made against him, and let me quote briefly from the record of the hearings before the Senate subcommittee.

Mr. McKELLAR. From what page is the Senator about to read?

Mr. OVERTON. This is from page 69 of the Senate committee hearings:

Senator GLASS. Doctor, to show you that I am not mistaken in the Senator Glass. Doctor, to show you that I am not mistaken in the statement I made, I have here before me the order you issued on June 30, 1938, in which you, in my view of the matter, are guilty of totally unethical procedure to reduce these positions, the visiting staff, practically to inferiors, and in item 15 you say:

"Since the teaching affiliation exists by agreement between the Department of Health and the hospitals at the Georgetown and George Washington Universities' Medical Schools, the representatives from each school may sit with the committee to confer on educational matters of joint interests. Such representatives shall not, by virtue of this assignment, be entitled to vote."

In other words, despite the fact that the visiting staff for 10 years had given its services free of charge, which it has been estimated and given its services free of charge, which it has been estimated before the committee, if paid for, would cost some $300,000 or $400,000, and they would be subject to these new youngsters who were brought down here at $5,600 a year.

Dr. Ruhland. Senator, that language is taken, if I mistake not, from the rules of the medical department of the New York City

There is further testimony along the same line, which it is unnecessary for me to read. I am merely reading this in order to show the Senator from Wisconsin that the senior Senator from Virginia did put Dr. Ruhland on notice and did interrogate him in reference to what he considered bad management on the part of Dr. Ruhland as health officer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to this amendment, but at this point I wish to make a suggestion to the traffic officer of the city of Washington, and to the Commissioners, as well.

There have been erected recently some half dozen or a dozen—I do not know exactly how many—small iron posts in the middle of Pennsylvania Avenue and in the middle of Constitution Avenue. They impede traffic very greatly, and I can hardly imagine a device more likely to bring about serious automobile accidents on two of the main thoroughfares of Washington than these posts which have been erected.

My purpose is not to offer an amendment of any kind, but I merely hope that the city authorities, and especially the Director of Traffic, will remove those unsightly improper, unnecessary, and dangerous obstructions to public traffic. It seems to me that the use of lights would be infinitely preferable to the use of so many of these iron posts, which are almost an open invitation to accident.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee beginning on page 76, line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Police traffic control", page 77, line 13, after the word "highways", to strike out "$518,885" and insert "$526,010", so as to read:

On page 49, line 21, after the word "requirements", it is proposed to insert "and excepting the chief resident physician and alienist in charge of the psychopathic department the compensation of the chief resident physicians after April 30, 1940, shall not exceed $2,600 per annum each."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is that in keeping with the amendment which was just defeated a few moments ago?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. McNARY. I want no action taken upon that amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like the Senate to vote on it. The proposed amendment was sent to me by the senior Senator from Virginia, and I have offered it in his behalf and would like the Senate to pass on it.

Mr. McNARY. I thought we had disposed of that matter. Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President. The proposed amendment is, however, in line with the other. I am perfectly willing that the Senate should vote on it.

Mr. McNARY. I know nothing about it, but I want to protect the interests of the Senator from Wisconsin, who led the successful fight against the other unjust amendment. I do not care to ask for a quorum call now. I can send for the Senator from Wisconsin if the Senator from Tennessee has other amendments to offer which can be considered meanwhile. I must have the Senator from Wisconsin here when the amendment in question is considered. Has the Senator any other amendments to offer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). The Chair is informed that an amendment on page 19 was passed over and is still pending.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, when the committee amendments were under consideration I asked that the amendment on page 19 be passed over until the other committee amendments had been acted upon, and it was so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Oregon is willing that the Senate vote on the amendment I have just offered on behalf of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. McNARY. Conditionally. Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee on behalf of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "$606,840" and to insert in lieu thereof "$596,840."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment on page 49, line 22.

section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, and civil-service requirements, and for other necessary expenses, and the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department is authorized and directed to render such services in planning as the Commissioners may deem necessary, subject to reimbursement for such services.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment on page 19, line 4, was previously passed over. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19, line 4, after "$20,000", it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That not to exceed 50 percent of this appropriation shall be expended for materials and work to be performed at the Reformatory at Lorton, Va.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment. Today we have in the District of Columbia and surrounding country free labor which is ready, anxious, and willing to go to work in the printing and binding trades, and capable of being so employed. If the amendment is adopted it means that 50 percent of this money will be used in a penal institution, and thus deprive free labor of the opportunity of employment within the District at the very time when we are carrying a heavy burden for relief within the District, at the very time when labor is seeking employment everywhere in this country, and especially in the District of Columbia.

I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Nevada in expressing the hope that the amendment will be rejected for the reasons specified by the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment. Last year the District of Columbia appropriation bill contained a provision that 50 percent of this bookbinding appropriation should go to the Lorton Reformatory. The Lorton Reformatory has expended over $6,000 in obtaining bookbinding equipment to do this work. Men have been put to work there, and they have done very good work. Mr. Huff, of the Lorton Reformatory, brought before the committee samples of bookbinding that was done there, and the work appeared to have been very well done indeed.

Furthermore, the work is improving. This fund does not go altogether to labor, as I understand. The 50 percent that is allocated to the library is for work done in the library department, and is not let out except occasionally under contract.

I think it is good policy to employ in useful work the prisoners at the Lorton Reformatory. Their work does not come in competition with free labor. The product of this bookbinding is not put out on the public market. The books that are rebound are not sold commercially. The work is done for the benefit of the District of Columbia.

In view of the fact that under the authorization of Congress last year over $6,000 has been spent in equipment which would practically have to be thrown away, and in view of the fact that the work in question is about as useful a noncompetitive work as these prisoners could be engaged in, I hope that the provision will be retained by the Senate.

Mr. McCarran. Mr. President, the able argument made by the Senator in charge of the bill might be made with reference to work that is done in any penal institution in the country. It has been the policy of the Congress and the policy of every State to see to it that prison labor does not put out a product in competition with free labor. Certainly in the District of Columbia where people from all over the world congregate, and where labor looks for the greatest opportunity to exercise its right to live by toil, we should not set the example here in the Nation's Capital of putting a penal institution in competition with free labor.

It cannot be denied that we have free labor here willing, anxious, capable, and desirous of going to work. The work in question is work that they can do, work that they want to do, work that is being done in free institutions throughout the country.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am afraid the Senator did not correctly state the rule with respect to the employment of convict labor in the States, at least not as I understand it. The rule generally is that convicts may not compete with free labor by engaging in an industry which also is carried on by private capital. But convicts make automobile tags. The metal automobile tags could be made by free labor. The convicts in the various penitentiaries make a public article that the State disposes of. Automobile tags are not manufactured and sold privately.

It is my understanding and the understanding of the committee that all the books that are to be repaired at Lorton are books which belong to the District of Columbia, many of them textbooks which are provided free to the children.

They become worn out, and they are repaired and again issued. It may be in the interest of the school-book trust to see that the books are not reconditioned and given back to the children, so that more new books must be bought, but if it is proper at all to repair a school book after one child has used it and let another child have it free of cost, it seems to me that is public business and not private business. The same thing is true of any other bookbinding which is done. It is done solely for the District of Columbia, and not in competition with private enterprises. If we operated a book bindery at Lorton which advertised for bids and took the business away from private book binderies in the District of Columbia, then I should say the Senator's argument would be entirely logical, but the facts do not justify the statement that there is competition with free labor, because the work might not otherwise be done at all.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I take the position that anything that deprives free labor of an opportunity to work should not be encouraged at Government expense. That is exactly what we are doing. We are encouraging convict labor and using public moneys to pay for convict labor, depriving those who are willing to work and who are without employment of an opportunity to work.

Mr. HAYDEN. A committee headed by former Senator Hawes, of Missouri, conducted a very careful investigation of the whole question of the employment of convict labor throughout the United States. A rule was formulated. It was found that in some States convict labor was being used to make articles which were otherwise made by private enterprise, such as brooms, jute bags, and articles of that sort, in connection with which business was taken away from private enterprises. The committee laid down a rule at that time—and I think it is a sound rule—that no convict labor should be employed in any activity of that kind; but when the material used is wholly the property of a State, and when converted to a higher purpose by labor is again used by the State, a very different situation prevails. As I understand, that is the situation in the District of Columbia. I think the rule in the District of Columbia is no different from that in many States of the Union.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. The statement made by the Senator from Arizona is in accord with the testimony of Mr. Huff, who is in charge of the Lorton Reformatory. He says:

We operate exclusively under the State-use system. No private purchaser can enter the picture at all.

Bookbinding is not all that is done at the reformatory. The inmates make brick, they do laundry work, and there are a clothing factory, a knitting mill, and a shoe shop.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The laundry work, of course, is done for the institution?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. And the bricks are undoubtedly used in the institution.

Mr. OVERTON. They are used by the Federal Government and the District of Columbia government, but they are made for Government purposes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I would oppose such activities just as I oppose what is done in the present instance because I do not think it should be done.

Mr. OVERTON. What would the Senator have the inmates do? Would he have them remain idle?

Mr. McCarran. Not necessarily. I have no objection to the production of such articles as go into the institution and are utilized by the institution. There are two lines of competition—one is competition of commodities and the other is competition of labor. In this instance it is competition of labor because convict labor is being used against free labor which is unemployed and ready to go to work; and if the free labor is not employed it must be put on the relief roll, whereas the convict labor is taken care of and sustained by the Government itself.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand, others will go on the relief rolls if this work is taken away from them.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 19, line 4. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. OVERTON. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 5610) was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2314) to establish the position of Under Secretary in the Department of Commerce, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSING ACT OF 1937

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 591, known as the amendment to the Housing Act of 1937.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. McNARY addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the bill is to be made the unfinished business with the understanding that it will not be considered today, but will go over until tomorrow. Because of the absence of a number of Senators who are interested in the measure, it is only the purpose to make it the unfinished business, but not to take it up today.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that answers my inquiry. The able Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taft] has been called out of the city and will not return until tomorrow. He is a member of the committee and is interested in the bill. He wishes to make a few observations, and I desire that he have an opportunity to do so. Therefore, with the assurance that the bill will not be taken up today, I have no objection to making it the unfinished business.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, that is agreeable to me, provided I may have the floor tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our most merciful Father, without whom nothing is pure and nothing is enduring, we praise Thee that Thou carest for us; Thy mercies are so manifold. In our need we ask for a ray of hope and into life's sky Thou dost flash love's unfading bow of promise. Thou dost bless us with loving friendships in whose hearts truth is truth and love is love. We pray Thee that we may be pure-hearted and clean-handed, and then we shall learn that the world is full of wonder, full of love, and full of God, and by these we are related to the precious gifts of life. Springing out of genuine sincerity, may the spirit of brotherhood prevail here from hour to hour. May the rich blessings of an all-wise, loving Father be upon our distinguished Speaker and the Congress. Help us all, dear Lord, to appreciate and preserve the trust and the dignity which have been reposed in us, and Thine shall be the praise. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 2, 1939, was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, on Saturday, June 3, Georgetown University held its sesquicentennial convocation and its award of honors. It was indeed appropriate, therefore, that this great educational institution, upon the occasion of its one hundred and fiftieth anniversary, should honor another body founded at the same time. To receive the award, the university selected our beloved Speaker and conferred upon him the honorary degree of doctor of [Applause.]

In his reply Speaker BANKHEAD said in part:

No government for a great people can hope to survive purely upon political ideology. There must be coupled with it cultural and spiritual and professional ideals and practices to stabilize the morale of the people, to govern their personal conduct by systems of sound moral ethics, and to teach them materialistic values are but a portion of the patrimony of a sound and enduring civilization. Speaking as a representative of the legislative branch of our Government, I invoke with unrestrained confidence your further cooperation in sustaining in full strength and substance the essence of our democratic institutions which make men free—free to speak their hopest convictions, free to worship their God in such fashion their honest convictions, free to worship their food in such fashion as conscience and conviction may choose without coercion or restraint from any temporal power; free to acquire and bequeath; free to set up our own altars and hearthstones without let or hindrance; free to order our own lives without punitive menace from any quarter; and free to cherish every noble memory that occasions like this inspire this inspire.

The Georgetown University has grown side by side with the Congress of the United States and was the first Catholic college founded in the United States.

The high light of the sesquicentennial ceremonies, along with the signal honor bestowed upon our worthy Speaker, was the receipt of a letter from Pope Pius XII in his own handwriting addressed to the president of the university, in which he paid high tribute to the university and its founder, John Carroll, first bishop of the Catholic hierarchy in the United States. The text of the letter of the Pope is as follows:

Georgetown University is commemorating during these days, beloved son, the 150 years that have passed since its foundation, and we cannot but share deeply your great joy, while we congratulate you on the splendid results achieved during these 15 decades. When in the year 1789 John Carroll, first bishop of the Catholic hierarchy in the United States, built his college on the heights of Georgetown he erected a monument significant and worthy of the galous for severing prelate and of the great genuine worthy of the zealous, far-seeing prelate, and of the ardent, genuine patriot. That college became, as he tells in his letters, the object dearest to his heart. For he saw clearly, as did likewise his great contemporary the first President of the nascent Republic, that the life and prosperity of his beloved country would depend in very large measure on the cultural and religious training of its youth. Nor could he contribute more effectively to safeguarding and strengthening the foundations of the state than by forging, as he did in Georgetown College, the beginnings of that magnificent chain of Catholic schools and colleges and universities, where the future citizen is taught the eternal truth, that only he can serve his country best who serves his God first.

For in vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who For in vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert religion and morality, those great pillars of human happiness, those firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. By act of Congress, signed March 1, 1815, by President James Madison, the state gave public testimony to its gratitude by raising Georgetown College to the full stature of a university; and on March 30, 1833, our predecessor of happy memory, Pope Gregory XVI, crowned the masterly work of Carroll by granting to the faculties of philosophy and theology the power of conferring degrees in those supreme sciences. With every good reason, therefore, beloved son, does Georgetown University recall with profound sentiments of gratitude to Almighty God 150 years of honorable service to God and country. Through the sacrifices and unstinting labors of these who have gone before you—and to whom we and you pay the homage of grateful memory—a single unit with a small group of students has grown steadily and strongly into the attractive university city with its six faculties and more than 3,000 students. During a century and a half members of the Society of Jesus uninterruptedly have devoted their learning and their lives to the enlightenment and character formation of the young men entrusted to their care.

During a century and a half these students, leaving the walls of their alma mater, have added Christian dignity and honor and right thinking to the family life, to the business and highest proright thinking to the family life, to the business and highest professional circles of their country. We rejoice with you in the consoling memories of these 150 years, and we offer our prayer of thanksgiving to God, the giver of every good gift. The destinies of Georgetown University under God are now in your hands. May he guide you and strengthen you so that the cherished hopes of the great Archbishop Carroll may each year be realized with everincreasing fullness to the glory of God and to the spiritual grandeur of your country. As a token of our paternal interest and of our desire to encourage the all-important work of Catholic education that you are so ably carrying on, to you, beloved son, to the directions of the control of the control of the control of the direction that you are so ably carrying on, to you, beloved son, to the directions of the control of th that you are so ably carrying on, to you, beloved son, to the directors of Georgetown College, to the professors and students, and to all those present and united with you in your sesquicentennial celebrations we impart the apostolic blessing.

Given at Rome from St. Peter's, on the 21st day of May, A. D.

1939, the first of our pontificate.

(Signed) Prus PP. XII.

The convocation opened with the reading of the congressional charter of the university, granted in 1815. The Very Reverend Arthur O'Leary, S. J., the president, aptly described the growth and aims of the university. He said:

Georgetown has been builded step by step with the self-sacrificing hands and devoted hearts of a long line of men, who have given their time and their talents and their very lives to the training of the hearts and minds and bodies of youth. We take pride in our past and we feel that the rich tradition of practical service to our Nation during all these years gives us every reason for great courage and high hope that the future may continue and even expand our sphere of usefulness. The past is a glowing lamp that will guide us upward and onward toward the goal of perfect service.

In view of the importance of this event, I think it fitting that we today acknowledge our sincere gratitude and deep appreciation to Georgetown University for its recognition of the character and service of our distinguished Speaker. The further honors he will wear, we can be certain, with increasing modesty and greater service to his country and to this body. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this afternoon at the conclusion of the address by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Engel], under special order heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 12 minutes to present a request of the Press Gallery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

UNVEILING OF STATUE OF WILL ROGERS

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock in the rotunda of the Capitol there will be unveiled a statue to Oklahoma's illustrious son, Will Rogers, to be placed in Memorial Hall. The Oklahoma delegation is pleased to invite the friends of Will Rogers and the Members of the House to attend this ceremony.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO WAGE AND HOUR BILL

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, we have reached the point when this House should reclaim the right to legislate upon its own responsibility. [Applause.] The defeat of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the labor bill which is expected to come up this morning would be a step in this direction.

The doors of the Committee on Rules are still open ready to receive any Member of this House who will ask for an open rule for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman mean that we should vote down the motion for a second to the bill?

Mr. COX. That is what I hope the House will do.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand the parliamentary situation, it is this: When a Member rises and moves to suspend the rules and pass this bill, then a second will be demanded. If a second is not granted by unanimous consent, then the House is forced to vote upon it. If the second is voted down, then the chairman of the committee will have to go to the Rules Committee and get a rule to bring that bill before the House?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute in order to complete this

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman answer that question? Mr. COX. I may say to the gentleman, speaking for myself, that I oppose taking up so important a question as is proposed by the pending bill just referred to on a motion to suspend the rules. No request has been made of the Rules Committee for a rule covering consideration of this important measure. That committee stands ready, I am sure, to grant an open rule for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. RANKIN. That is what I want to know. If the request for a second is voted down, will the Rules Committee bring in an open rule and give the House the right to pass upon the bill?

Mr. COX. I can only say it is my belief, and I believe I speak advisedly, that the Rules Committee will upon application of any Member of the House, preferably a member of the Committee on Labor, grant an open rule for the consideration of the measure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article appearing in yesterday's papers by Mark Sullivan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]?

There was no objection.

GEN. GEORGE VAN HORN MOSELEY

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, the press of Saturday carried the statement that Gen. George Van Horn Moseley, former Chief of Staff of the United States Army, had stated before the Dies committee that the President had sold the country down the river. One of my colleagues claims that he should be court-martialed for his statement. I claim he should be given a Congressional Medal of Honor. In that same spirit, General Moseley claimed that the White House should conduct a house cleaning of its own, and that President Roosevelt could in a few minutes' time rid the administration of the Communists by discharging them from the Government jobs.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have heard made by new Members and old ones very unfortunate and very unfair statements about a President of the United States, but I have never heard a more unfortunate, unfair, or cruel statement reechoed on the floor of the House of Representatives. I am utterly amazed that the gentleman would repeat the statements of as irresponsible a man as General Moseley is, judging from the testimony he gave before the Dies committee as well as his general attitude. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker. I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

AVIATION CADETS IN THE NAVAL AND MARINE CORPS RESERVES

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5765) to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand the amendments of the Senate have been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House and unanimously agreed to by them, but I believe the chairman should explain these amendments for the RECORD.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have consulted with the ranking minority member, and there is no disagreement from his viewpoint with reference to these amendments.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman state just what the amendments are?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. When the bill passed the House it was referred to as the Naval Reserve Act of 1939. The Senate amended the bill to make it effective on July 1, 1939. The House provided that a report should be presented to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Senate changed it so that the report would be submitted to the Congress. These are the only two amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JEFFERSON DAVIS-A JUDICIAL ESTIMATE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein some extracts from an address delivered by Bishop Charles B. Galloway, of my State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, June 3, was the anniversary of the birth of Jefferson Davis, the great White Chieftain of the Confederacy, one of the greatest men this Nation has ever produced. [Applause.]

He has been maligned, abused, and misrepresented more than any other man who has ever served in public life in

No man ever paid him a higher tribute, or a more deserved tribute than that delivered by Bishop Charles B. Galloway, of the Southern Methodist Church of my own State. I shall insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks Bishop Galloway's address in order that the American people may. at this late date, know the truth about this great man who has now been dead these 50 years. A greater patriot, an abler statesman, a braver soldier, or a more consecrated Christian this Nation has not seen. [Applause.]

The matter referred to follows:

ADDRESS OF BISHOP CHARLES B. GALLOWAY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF MIS-SISSIPPI ON THE ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF

With unaffected distrust of my ability to meet the demands of such a great hour as this, I rejoice to be again on the beautiful campus of my alma mater and have the opportunity of bringing a campus of my alma mater and have the opportunity of bringing a message to the young men of my country. And as this commencement day chances to be the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Jefferson Davis, the most illustrious citizen whose name ever adorned and enriched the annals of Mississippi, I have had the temerity to select his Life and Times as the theme of this hour's discussion. To paint, with skillful hand, the full-length portrait of that majestic man, or adequately portray the qualities that gave him greatness and the virtues that make him immortal, I cannot; but, with you, I can reverently sit at his feet and listen to a story him greatness and the virtues that make him immortal, I cannot, but, with you, I can reverently sit at his feet and listen to a story that will stir within us many a noble aspiration and cause us to seek more diligently the old paths of manly honor and high endeavor. My purpose is not to indulge in extravagant or indiscriminate eulogy but, if possible, give a judicial estimate of a great man who was the most commanding figure in a fierce and eventful settimed exists. It shell be alike proposed from intrascenting connational crisis. It shall be alike removed from unreasoning censure and unreasonable praise. We need not deify Mr. Davis, or disproportionately exalt the pedestal on which the Genius of Hisdisproportionately exact the petestant of which the centar of the tory will surely place him, in order to show adequate appreciation of his noble character and splendid genius. On the other hand, the use of bitter invective and lurid superlatives about this man of destiny may evidence literary ingenuity and partisan malignity, but can never any more command the respect of patriotic, thoughtful students of our national history.

The days of malignant vituperation are gone, and the time of judicial interpretation has come. It is not necessary now to "measure all facts by considerations of latitude and longitude." The character and life work of Jefferson Davis were never so diligently and dispassionately studied as today. War passions have sufficiently cooled, and war clouds have so floated from our necessary to the most adapt and sentimental national. tional skies that even the most ardent and sentimental national-ist can study the man and his times in a clear, white light. A citizen whose moral and religious ideals were the most exalted, and whose daily conduct was sought to be modeled after the Man of Galilee, and whose life has in it as little to explain or apologize for, as any leader in American politics, can never be caricatured as a monster or condemned as a traitor, and have anybody really believe it.

The unanswered question in England for 240 years was, "Shall Cromwell have a statue?" It required nearly 2½ centuries for public opinion to reach a just estimate of the most colossal figure in English history. The great lord protector died at Whitehall and was laid to rest, with royal honors, in Westminster Abbey. But when the monarchy was restored, and Charles II ascended the but when the monarchy was restored, and charles it ascended throne, his body was disinterred, gibbetted at Tyburn Hill and buried under the gallows, the head being placed on Westminster Hall. Now, a magnificent statue of the great Oliver stands opposite where his head was exposed to the jeers of every passerby—England's sane and final estimate of the mightiest man who ever England's sane and final estimate of the mightlest man who ever led her legions to victory or guided the course of her civil history. In the new world, events move faster, popular passion cools quicker, and calm judgment more speedily reascends its sacred throne. After 40 years since the Civil War, the Nation's estimate of Jefferson Davis—the Oliver Cromwell of our constitutional crisis—has almost entirely changed, and points to the not far-off day when no place in our Federal capital will be too conspicuous for his heroic statue. Mr. Davis can no more be understood by reading the heated columns of the political newspapers and hisday when no place in our receival capital will be too conspicuous for his heroic statue. Mr. Davis can no more be understood by reading the heated columns of the political newspapers and historical writers of the days immediately succeeding the Civil War than Oliver Cromwell could be judicially interpreted by the obsequious literature of the reign of Charles II.

Mr. Davis had his limitations and was not without his measure of human faults and frallities; but he also had extraordinary gifts and radiant virtues and a brilliant genius that rank him among the mightiest men of the centuries. He made mistakes, because he the mignuest men of the centuries. He made mistakes, because his was mortal, and he excited antagonisms because his convictions were stronger than his tactful graces; but no one who knew him, and no dispassionate student of his history, ever doubted the sincerity of his great soul or the absolute integrity of his imperial purpose. Let us, on his anniversary day, learn some patriotic lessons from the life history of this greatest Mississippian, replight our faith to the unalterable principles of constitutional liberty to which he to the unalterable principles of constitutional liberty to which he was passionately devoted, and renew our fealty to the flag of our reunited country, which he never ceased to love.

I have read of a peculiar notion entertained by the ancient Norsemen. They supposed that, beside the soul of the dead, a ghost survived, haunting for awhile the scenes of his earthly labors. Though at first vivid and lifelike, it slowly waned and faded, until at length it vanished, leaving behind no trace or memory of its spectral presence. I am glad that the ghosts of old sectional issues are vanishing and soon will cease to haunt and mock the fears of the most anxious and nervous of American patriots. It is a grateful fact, in which all rejoice, that this Nation is more united in heart and number to the property in the history. and purpose today than ever in its history.

While I would not needlessly stir the embers of settled strife or reopen the grave of buried issues or, by a word, revive the bitter memories of a stormy past, it is due the truth of history that the fundamental principles for which our fathers contended should be often reiterated, in order that the purpose which inspired them may be correctly estimated and the purity of their motives be abundantly vindicated.

If the condition of affairs in 1860 be thoroughly understood, and one has a clear and accurate knowledge of the nature and character of the Federal Government, together with the rights of the acter of the Federal Government, together with the rights of the States under the Constitution, we need not fear the judgments that may be formed and the conclusions that will be reached. But unfortunately for the truth of history, up to recent years, we have been "confronted by dogmas which are substituted for principles, by preconceived opinions which are claimed to be historical verities, and by sentimentality which closes the avenues of the mind against logic and demonstration."

But hefore studying the lessons of a great cause a great loader.

But before studying the lessons of a great cause, a great leader, and a great era, I call attention to a rather singular historic fact. The most illogical and unreasoning sentiment—which yet lingers, but is fast fading—a sentiment universal in the North and more or less entertained in the South—is that which has persistently discrimitated against Mr. Davis, helding, him to indictive security.

but is fast fading—a sentiment universal in the North and more or less entertained in the South—is that which has persistently discriminated against Mr. Davis, holding him to vindictive account for the ever-to-be-lamented war and all its terrible consequences, while others have been acquitted of blame, and many applauded as patriots and heroes. Upon his weary shoulders have been piled the sins of the South, and he has been execrated as the arch traitor of American politics. Those who thus judge have taken counsel of their prejudices, and evidence an almost criminal ignorance of the facts of history. Was Mr. Davis more a sinner than Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson, that he should be condemned and they so universally praised? Did he follow any flag for which they did not draw their swords? Did he advocate any doctrine to which they did not subscribe, and write their names in blood? Did he avow allegiance to any government to which they did not pledge life and sacred honor? And yet, in some sections of our country, he has been gibbetted, and they have been applauded.

I know there is a certain glamour that gathers about a military hero which commands admiration and calls for extravagant laudation. One who braves the shout of battle and wins the chaplet of victory, is unconsciously invested with a halo more brilliant than the crown of any civilian, however marvelous his gifts or magnificent his achievements or immortal the results of his public labors. People will applaud the returning conqueror while they forget the founder of an empire or the author of a nation's constitution. By virtue of his exalted position, first as the trusted political leader of a great party, and then as the President of a storm-cradled nation, Mr. Davis invited antagonisms and could not escape the sharpest criticism. Having to deal with the rivalries of political leaders, the jealousies of military aspirants, the bitterness of the disappointed, the selfishness of the discontented, and indeed all classes, in every department of the civ held accountable for everything, from the failure to capture Washington after the first battle of Manassas, to the unsuccessful return of the peace commission and the surrender of Lee's tattered legions at Appomattox.

As this discussion will be more the study of an epochal man and his times rether then the restrict of the study of the study his times, rather than the recital of personal history, I shall not repeat in detail the well-known facts of an eventful career. The son of a gallant Revolutionary soldier, and with the finest strain of Weish blood flowing in his generous veins, Jeferson Davis was born in the State of Kentucky. In infancy he was brought by his father to Mississippi, and here his entire life was spent. At the county school he was prepared for Transylvania College, from which, at the age of 16, he passed to the United States Military Academy at West Point. In that institution he was distinguished as a state of the country as a student and a gentleman, and in due time was graduated with high honor.

Jefferson Davis began life well. He had a clean boyhood, with no tendency to vice or immorality. That was the universal testimony of neighbors, teachers, and fellow students. He grew up a stranger to deceit and a lover of the truth. He formed no evil habits that he had to correct, and forged upon himself no chains that he had to break. His nature was as transparent as the light that shone about him; his heart was as open as the soft skies that that shone about him; his heart was as open as the soft skies that bent in benediction over his country home; and his temper as sweet and cheery as the limpid stream that made music in its flow through the neighboring fields and forests.

Graduating from West Point in 1828, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Regular Army, and spent 7 laborious years in the military service, chiefly in the middle Northwest, and had some conspicuous part in the Black Hawk War. In 1835 Lieutenant had been the Beauler Army market the bearens. some conspicuous part in the Black Hawk War. In 1835 Lieutenant Davis resigned from the Regular Army, married the charming daughter of Gen. Zachary Taylor, and settled on his Mississippi plantation, to follow the luxurious, literary life of a cultured southern gentleman. But the untimely death, in a few short months, of his fair young bride, crushed his radiant hopes and disappointed all his life plans. After 7 years, spent mostly in agricultural pursuits, and in literary study, especially the study of political philosophy and constitutional history, he entered public life, and almost immediately rose to trusted and conspicuous leadership.

In 1844 Mr. Davis was elected to Congress, and over the resident.

In 1844 Mr. Davis was elected to Congress, and ever thereafter, up to the fall of the Confederate Government, was in some distinguished capacity or other connected with the public service of his country. When he entered the Halls of Congress, the Oregon question, the reannexation of Texas, and the revision of the tariff were the stormy issues that divided the Nation into two hostile camps. The scholarly young Representative from Mississippi soon appeared in the lists, and by his thorough mastery of the questions involved attracted national attention. The venerable ex-President, John Quincy Adams, the "old man eloquent," at that time a Member of the House, was greatly impressed with his extraordinary ability and predicted his brilliant parliamentary career. Referring to his first set speech in Congress, a recent biographer, makes this just and suggestive observation: "He manifests here, in his early efforts as a legislator some of the larger views of national life and efforts as a legislator, some of the larger views of national life and development which have been so persistently ignored by those who have chronicled his career."

In that first great speech, which had all the marks and carried all the credentials of the profoundest statesmanship, Mr. Davis made this broad declaration from the principle of which he never receded: "The extent of our Union has never been to me the cause of apprehension; its cohesion can only be disturbed by violation of the compact which cements it."

Believing as he did in the righteousness of the conflict with Mexico, Mr. Davis earnestly advocated the most liberal supply of means and men to prosecute the war, and announced himself as ready, should his services be needed, to take his place in the tented field. In June 1846 a regiment of Mississippi volunteers was organfield. In June 1886 a regiment of Mississippi volunteers was objected at Vicksburg, and Jefferson Davis was elected its colonel. He accordingly resigned his seat in Congress, hastened to join his regiment, which he overtook at New Orleans, and reported for duty to General Taylor on the Mexican border. At Monterey and Buena Vista, crucial positions of the war, his command rendered containing the containing th Vista, crucial positions of the war, his command fendered conspicuously heroic service. Our American knighthood was in fairest flower that day, especially on the plains of Buena Vista, when Colonel Davis, against overwhelming numbers, snatched victory from almost certain defeat, and won immortal fame for himself and his gallant Mississippi rifles. By a brilliant tactical movement he broke the strength of the Mexican army and sent General Santa Anna southward with only half the force of the day before. Though a coverely wounded he remained in his saddle refusing to quit the Anna southward with only half the force of the day before. Though severely wounded he remained in his saddle, refusing to quit the field until the day of glorious triumph was complete. General Zachary Taylor, commander in chief of the American forces, paid this eloquent tribute to the soldierly courage and genius of the distinguished Mississippian: "Napoleon never had a marshal who behaved more superbly than did Colonel Davis today."

Returning from Mexico, having won the highest honors of war, Colonel Davis and the brave remnant of his magnificent regiment, were everywhere welcomed with boundless enthusiasm. He was tendered the position of brigadier general of volunteers by President Polk, but declined, on constitutional grounds, holding that such appointment inhered only in the State.

Within 2 months after his return from Mexico, crowned with Within 2 months after his return from Mexico, crowned with immortal honor, Mr. Davis was appointed by the Governor to rep-resent Mississippi in the United States Senate, a vacancy having immortal honor, Mr. Davis was appointed by the Governor to represent Mississippi in the United States Senate, a vacancy having occurred by the death of Senator Spaight. When the legislature met he was elected unanimously for the remainder of the unexpired term, all party lines having disappeared in a universal desire to honor the brilliant young colonel of the Mississippi Rifles. That was a position most congenial to his tastes and ambitions, and there his superb abilities shone with a splendor rarely equaled in the parliamentary history of America. He was an ideal Senator, dignified, self-mastered, serious, dispassionate, always bent on the great things that concerned the welfare of the Nation. He was never flippant—never toyed with trifles—and never trifled with the destiny of his people. His was the skill and strength to bend the mighty bow of Ulysses.

When Jefferson Davis entered the United States Senate the glory of that upper Chamber was at its height. Possibly never at one time had so many illustrious men sat in the highest council of the Nation. There were giants in those days. There sat John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina; Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts; Henry Clay, of Kentucky; Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri; Lewis Cass, of Michigan; Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio; Stephen A. Douglass, of Illinois, and other men of lesser fame. In that company of giants Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, at once took rank among the greatest, "eloquent among the most eloquent in debate," and worthy to be the premier at any council table of American statesmen. The historian Prescott pronounced him "the most accomplished" Member of the body.

One who spoke by the authority of large experience with the ber of the body.

One who spoke by the authority of large experience with the upper Chamber thus correctly characterized our brilliant and accomplished young Senator: "It is but simple justice to say that in ripe scholarship, wide and accurate information on all subjects coming scholarship, wide and accurate information on all subjects coming before the body, native ability, readiness as a debater, true honor, and stainless character, Jefferson Davis stood in the very first rank, and did as much to influence legislation and leave his mark on the Senate and the country as any other who served in his day."

Senator Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, afterward spoke of him as "the clear-headed, practical, dominating Davis."

That which preeminently signalized the public character and parliamentary career of Jefferson Davis was his sincere, unwavering devotion to the doctrine of State sovereignty, and all the practical devotion to the doctrine of State sovereignty, and all the practical questions that flowed therefrom. He held with unrelaxing grasp to the fundamental fact that the Union was composed of separate, independent, sovereign States, and that all Federal power was delegated, specifically limited, and clearly defined. The titanic struggles of the option within the control of the contro gles of his entire public life were over this one vital issue, with all that it logically involved for the weal or woe of his beloved ccuntry. The Articles of Confederation declared, in express terms, that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled," and that principle was transferred intact to the Constitution itself. And as one function of sovereignty was the right to withdraw from a compact, if occasion demanded, he planted himself squarely upon that doctrine, and never wavered in its able and fearless advocacy—a doctrine, by the way, that was never questioned by any jurist or statesman for 40 years after the Constitution was adopted.

Having read and reread, with great diligence and no less delight, the whole history of the fierce controversies that culminated in the War between the States, including the ablest speeches of our profoundest statesmen on both sides, and with all my genuine pride in a restored Union, I am bound to say that the southern position was never shaken, and that the overwhelming weight of argument was on the side of John C. Calhoun and Jefferson Davis, And further, it was by surrendering the constitutional argument and resorting to what was denominated "the higher law" of political conduct and conscience that the North found apology or depart for its attitude toward the inglicenshe with a few the southern. fense for its attitude toward the inalienable rights of the Southern

In order that you may appreciate the grounds of my confident assertion, I quote a few paragraphs from what seems to me an absolutely unanswerable argument by John C. Calhoun, the greatest logician and profoundest political philosopher in the Nation: "In that character they formed the old confederation, and when it was proposed to supersede the Articles of the Confederation by the present Constitution, they met in convention as States, acted and voted as States, and the Constitution, when formed, was submitted for ratification to the people of the several States. It was ratified for ratification to the people of the several States. It was submitted by them as States, each State for itself; each, by its ratification, binding its own citizens; the parts thus separately binding them selves, and not the whole, the parts; and it is declared in the pre-amble of the Constitution to be ordained by the people of the United States, and in the article of ratification, when ratified, to be binding between the States so ratifying. The conclusion is inevitable that the Constitution is the work of the people of the States, considered as separate and independent political communi-ties; that they are its authors—their power created it, their voice clothed it with authority; that the Government formed is in reality their agent; and that the Union, of which the Constitution is the bond, is a Union of States and not of individuals."

And it is an interesting and suggestive fact that the latest historians and writers on constitutional government sustain the fundamental contention of southern statesmen.

The Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge, the accomplished scholar and distinguished Senator of Massachusetts, in his Life of Daniel Webster, makes this candid statement: "When the Constitution was adopted by the votes of the States at Philadelphia and accepted by votes of States in popular conventions, it was safe to say there was not a man in the country, from Washington to Hamilton on the one side, to George Clinton and George Mason on the other, who regarded the new system as anything but an experiment entered upon by the States, and from which each and every State had the right to peacefully withdraw—a right that was very likely to be exercised."

And in a recent illuminating address, the Honorable Charles Francis Adams, abundantly and absolutely vindicates the contention of Mr. Davis and other southern leaders, in this noble ut-terance: "To which side did the weight of argument incline dur-ing the great debate which culminated in our Civil War? The ing the great debate which culminated in our Civil War? The answer necessarily turns on the abstract right of what we term a sovereign State to secede from the Union at such time and for such cause as may seem to that State proper and sufficient. The issue is settled; irrevocably and for all time decided; it was settled 40 years ago, and the settlement since reached has been the result not of reason based on historical evidence, but of events and of force." And Mr. Adams further added: "The principles enunciated by South Carolina on the 20th of December, 1860, were enunciated by the Kentucky resolutions, November 16, 1798."

The position of Jefferson Davis, though by his enemies often denied and persistently obscured, was this—that while consistently and unanswerably defending the right of a State to secede, he never urged it as a policy, and deplored it as a possible necessity. Or to use the language of the resolution adopted by the States Rights Convention of Mississippi in June 1851, drawn by his own hand, "Secession was the last alternative, the final remedy, and should not be resorted to under existing circumstances."

It may be interesting in this connection to inquire when the exer-

It may be interesting in this connection to inquire when the exercise of a State's right to secede had its first and most threatening assertion. Alexander H. Stevens affirms that the right of a State assertion. Alexander H. Stevens amrms that the light of a standard to withdraw from the Union was never denied or questioned by any to withdraw from the Union was never denied or questioned by any of character and standing "until to withdraw from the Union was never denied or questioned by any jurist, publicist, or statesman of character and standing "until Kent's Commentaries appeared in 1826, nearly 40 years after the Government had gone into operation." And it is historic truth to state that the first threat to exercise this right, universally recognized in the early days of the Republic, was not heard in the South; "it first sprang up in the North." Not only so, but from 1795 to 1815, and again in 1845, there was an influential party in New England who favored and threatened the formation of a northern confederacy. Roger Griswold, a Representative in Congress from the State of Connecticut in 1804, declared that he was in favor of the New England States forming a republic by themin favor of the New England States forming a republic by themselves and seceding from the Union. Joseph Story, when in Congress, afterward a Justice of the Supreme Court and commentation on the Constitution, said: "It was a prevalent opinion then in Massachusetts * * * of a separation of the Eastern States from the Union."

In a famous speech delivered by Josiah Quincy, in Congress, January 14, 1811, against the admission of Louisiana into the Union as a State, these sentiments were defiantly uttered: "I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that if this bill passes, the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from their moral obliga-tions, and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare definitely for a separation, amicably, if they can, violently if they must." It must not be forgotten that these are not the words of Jefferson Davis. When he defended the doctrine of a State's right to sever its relation with the Union, he was denounced as a conspirator against the life of the Nation.

On December 15, 1814, the Hartford Convention assembled, composed of delegates from all the New England States, to protest against the war then in progress between the United States and England. They had suffered immense loss by the destruction of their commerce and fisheries, and rather than endure more for the Nation's account, they preferred to withdraw from the Union. The report, adopted unanimously by the convention, contains this language: "In case of deliberate, dangerous, and palpable infraclanguage: In case of deliberate, dangerous, and paparie limitations of the Constitution, affecting the sovereignty of a State, and the liberties of the people, it is not only the right, but the duty of such a State to interpose its authority for their protection, in the manner best calculated to secure that end. When emergencies occur, which are either beyond the reach of judicial tribunals, or too pressing to admit of the delay incident to their forms, States which here are common unnits must be their own judges and which have no common umpire, must be their own judges and execute their own decisions.'

While that threat was never carried into execution—the treaty of Ghent having been signed in the meantime—there is the solemn assertion on the part of these New England delegates of their sovereign right to withdraw from the Union if occasion seemed to demand. I make no comment upon the fact that while New England was meditating withdrawal from the Federal compact Gen. Andrew Jackson and his heroic legions in the battle at New Orleans were shedding their blood for the honor of our national flag. But I venshedding their blood for the honor of our national fiag. But I venture to ask this question, Is there anything in the lapse of a few years to make the utterances of Roger Griswold and Rufus King and Joseph Story and Josiah Quincy and the Hartford Convention less disloyal than the calm, philosophic reasoning of John C. Calhoun and Jefferson Davis? And yet no one ever hears of New England as "the hot bed of secession" and her political leaders as conspirators against the life of the Nation. No fair-minded student of history can acquit Josiah Quincy and find fault with Jefferson Davis.

The Legislature of Massachusetts in 1809 declared the embargo law "not legally binding on the citizens of the State." Now, in New England that was simply the assertion of inalienable rights. If in South Carolina, it would have been, and was, denounced as the vilest nullification.

Now I come to the conditions and questions that immediately preceded, if they did not precipitate, the dismemberment of the Union. Slavery, which existed in all but 1 of the States when the Union was formed, and in 15 of them when the war began, was the occasion but not the cause of the lamented conflict. But as Mr. Davis well said, "In the later controversies * * * its effect in operating as a lever upon the passions, prejudices, or sympathies of mankind was so potent that it has been spread like a thick cloud over the whole horizon of historic truth."

The right or wrong of slavery we need not discuss, or attempt to determine who was most responsible therefor. The institution is dead beyond the possibility of resurrection, and the whole Nation is glad. The later geographical limitations of slavery in the United States were determined not by conscience but by climate. It was climate at the North and the cotton gin in the South that regulated the distribution of slave labor. I have scant the conscience the sensitive to own central property. respect for a conscience too sensitive to own certain property because it is immoral, but without compunction will sell the same because it is immoral, but without compunction will seil the same to another at full market value. Had the slave holders of the North manumitted their slaves, and not sold them because their labor ceased to be profitable, there would have been more regard for their subsequent abolition zeal. It is a matter of pride with us that no Southern Colony or State ever had a vessel engaged in the slave trade. And several of the Southern States were the first to pass stringent laws against the importation of African slaves.

to pass stringent laws against the importation of African slaves. But apart from the ethical question involved, as we now see it, slave property was recognized by the Constitution and existed in every State but one when the Union was formed. And a clear mandate of the Constitution required slaves to be delivered up to their owners when escaping into another State. Congress passed laws to enforce the same, and their constitutionality was restricted by the Supreme Court in the forces. Dred Scott deal sustained by the Supreme Court in the famous Dred Scott decisustained by the Supreme Court in the famous Dred Scott decision. Daniel Webster, too great to be provincial, and too broad to be a narrow partisan, in a noble speech at Capon Springs, Va., in 1851, made this emphatic declaration:

"I have not hesitated to say, and I repeat, that if the Northern States refuse, willfully and deliberately, to carry into effect that part of the Constitution which respects the restoration of fugitive slaves, and Congress provide no remedy, the South would no longer be bound to observe the compact. A bargain cannot be broken on one side and still bind the other side. I say to you, centlemen in Virginia as I said on the shores of Lake Frie and broken on one side and still bind the other side. I say to you, gentlemen in Virginia, as I said on the shores of Lake Erie and in the city of Boston, as I may say again, that you of the South have as much right to receive your fugitive slaves as the North has to any of its rights and privileges of navigation and commerce."

And yet Charles Sumner, speaking for a great party growing in strength and dominance, with the rising sun of every day, said the North could not and would not obey the law. Wm. H. Seward declared that there was "a higher law" than the Constitution which would be the rule of their political conduct.

Now the insistence of Mr. Davis and his compatriots was that the Constitution and laws should be obeyed: that the individual, sovereign States must regulate their own domestic affairs without Federal interference, and that their property, of whatever kind, must be respected and protected. They resisted any invasion of the State's right to control its own internal affairs as a violation of the secred Federal compact. Over that one fundamental questions of the sacred Federal compact. Over that one fundamental question an "irrepressible conflict" was waged for many stormy years. The advocates of State sovereignty were charged with disloyalty to the Union, while the Federalists were denounced as enemies of the Constitution and usurpers of the rights of the States.

And, by the way, our present day political discussions are eloquently vindicating the patriotic jealousy of Mr. Davis for the rights of the States. The most significant fact of these strenuous times is the solemn warnings, in endless iteration and from both political parties, against the ominous encroachments of Federal authority. More and more the Nation is seeing that Jefferson Davis authority. was not an alarmist or an academical theorist, but a practical, sagacious, far-seeing statesman, when he contended so persistently for the rights and unconstrained functions of each member of the Federal Union.

Sectional agitation and alienation continued, with slight inter-ruption and increasing violence, for many weary years. Every lover of the Union deplored it, and every patriotic American sought some common ground on which all could stand, and the rights of each be preserved. But with every congressional debate and political convention and Supreme Court decision, this animosity was kindled into fiercer flame. On both sides the bitterness was intense. Political differences ripened into personal hates and hosintense. Political differences ripened into personal nates and noise tillities. Encounters between Congressmen over sectional issues were a daily dread in Washington. One Senator said: "I believe every man in both Houses is armed with a revolver." Fourteen of the Northern States passed so-called personal liberty laws, designed to nullify the Constitution, and encourage the people to disregard the Dred-Scott decision of the Supreme Court. State officers were the Dred-Scott decision of the Supreme Court. State officers were prohibited from assisting in the arrest of fugitive slaves, while State's attorneys were required to defend them, and provision made for paying the fugitive's expenses out of the State treasury. Charles Sumner openly declared that the North would not obey the fugitive-slave laws. William H. Seward, it was said, contributed money to John Brown which was used for pillage and murder. John Brown's midnight raid on Harpers Ferry was applauded to the echo throughout the North. And when the old assassin was executed, according to law, bells were tolled in many places, cannon were fired, and prayers offered for him as if he were the saintliest of martyrs. By fervid orators he was placed on the same canonized roll with Paul and Silas.

On the other hand the South was equally intolerant and aflame same canonized roll with Paul and Silas.

On the other hand the South was equally intolerant and aflame with intense excitement. Commercial conventions in Charleston, Montgomery, Memphis, and elsewhere adopted retaliatory measures against the aggressions of the North. Southerners declared that nonintercourse in business was "the one prescription for northern fanaticism and political villainy." Southern parents were condemned for patronizing northern colleges, and urged to enlarge and equip their own institutions and to use only southern textbooks. "If our schools are not good enough," they said, "let them be improved by a more hearty support; if this is not enough, let them patronize the universities of Europe rather than aid and abet in any way the bitter enemies of the Southland."

And as further evidence that northern leaders had determined no longer to uphold the Constitution and give to the South what no longer to uphold the Constitution and give to the South what she considered her rights and equality in the Union, we have only to reread the extreme and inflamed utterances of their chief men. to reread the extreme and inflamed utterances of their chief men. What could the Nation hope for when men in authority declared that the Constitution under which we lived is no longer of binding force, and that there is a "higher law" for the guidance of a citizens conduct and conscience? William H. Seward, the acknowledged head of the Republican Party, and the author of that doctrine, uttered these words: "There is a higher law than the Constitution which regulates our authority over the domain. Slavery must be abolished, and we must do it."

Horace Greely a most potential voice in the councils of his party, did not hesitate to say: "I have no doubt but the free and slave States ought to be separated—the Union is not worth supporting States ought to be separated—the Union is not worth supporting in connection with the South."

William Lloyd Garrison, at first derided as a fanatic, but afterward followed as the voice of an apostle, thus advocated the cause of disunion: "The Union is a lie. The American Union is an imposture, a covenant with death and an agreement with hell. We are for its overthrow. Up with the flag of disunion, that we may have a free and glorious republic of our own."

have a free and glorious republic of our own."

Wendell Phillips, the most eloquent orator in New England, and whose leadership was commanding, fed the flames of sectional animosity with speeches such as this: "There is merit in the Republican Party. It is this: It is the first sectional party ever organized in this country—it is not national; it is sectional. It is the North against the South. The first crack in the iceberg is visible; you will yet hear it go with a crack through the center."

The New York Tribune, for many years the acknowledged and most influential organ of Republican opinion in the United States, thus bade the South a respectful adieu: "The time is fast approaching when the cry will become too overpowering to resist. Rather than tolerate national slavery as it now exists, let the Union be dissolved at once."

With such utterances and the applauding echoes of a party flushed with political victory ringing in their ears, the South had little occasion to hope for aggressions to cease and conditions to improve. But through all the years this storm was fiercely rag-ing, the cool, sagacious Jefferson Davis never lost the clearness of his vision or allowed himself to be swept from his political moorings. He fought with all his superb skill and herculean strength for the rights of the States and warned his opponents that continued Federal invasion might drive them from the Union, but at the same time he reiterated his undying love for the whole country and its organic law, and prayed that the day of disunion would rever deeps would never dawn.

In an eloquent speech delivered at Portland, Maine, in 1858, Mr. Davis strikingly demonstrated the fact that State pride and devotion to State integrity strengthened rather than weakened our attachment to the Federal Union; that the larger love we have for our national flag is fed by the passionate devotion we manifest in the welfare of an individual State. He said: "No one more than myself recognizes the binding force of the allegiance which the citizen owes to the State of his citizenship, but the State being a party to our compact, a member of the Union, fealty to the Federal Constitution is not in opposition to but flows from the allegiance due to one of the United States. Washington was not less a Virginian when he commanded at Boston, nor did Gates and Green weaken the bonds which bound them to their several States by their campaigns in the South. In proportion as a citizen loves his own State will he strive to honor her by preserving her name and her fame free from the tarnish of having failed to observe her obligations and to fulfill her duties to her sister States. Do not our whole people—interior and seaboard, North, South, East, and West—alike feel proud of the Yankee sailor, who has borne our flag as far as the ocean bears its foam, and caused the name and character of the United States to be known and respected where there is wealth enough to woo commerce and intelligence to honor merit? So long as we preserve and appreciate the achievements of Jefferson and Adams of Franklin and Medison of Hemilton of Hemister, and of In an eloquent speech delivered at Portland, Maine, in 1858, Mr. enough to woo commerce and intelligence to honor merit? So long as we preserve and appreciate the achievements of Jefferson and Adams, of Franklin and Madison, of Hamilton, of Hancock, and of Rutledge—men who labored for the whole country and lived for mankind—we cannot sink to the petty strife which saps the foundations and destroys the political fabric our fathers erected and bequeathed as an inheritance to our posterity forever."

And a few weeks thereafter, when on a visit to Boston, addressing a great audience in Faneuil Hall, and speaking not only for himself but for the entire South as well, he uttered sentiments as broadly and loyally national as were ever spoken by Thomas Jefferson or sung in the battle hymns of the Republic. "As we have shared in the tolls," said he. "so we have gloried in the triumphs of our coun-the toils," said he, "so we have gloried in the triumphs of our country. In our hearts, as in our history, are mingled the names of Concord, and Camden, and Saratoga, and Lexington, and Plattsburg, and Chippewa, and Erie, and Moultrie, and New Orleans, and Yorktown, and Bunker Hill. Grouped all together they form a record of the triumps of our cause a manufactor of the common description. of the triumps of our cause, a monument of the common glory of our Union. What southern man would wish it less by one of the northern names of which it is composed? Or where is he workern on the obelisk that rises from the ground made sacred by the blood of Warren, would feel his patriot's pride suppressed by the blood of Warren, would feel his patriot's pride suppressed by local jealousy?"

As late as December 20, 1860, after the Presidential election and when events were hastening to a crisis, on the floor of the United States Senate, Mr. Davis reannounced his passionate love for the Union and pathetically plead for a spirit of conciliation that would make unnecessary the withdrawal of the South from their national fraternity. He said: "The Union is dear to me as a union of fraternal States. It would lose its value if I had to regard it as a union held together by physical force. I would be happy to of fraternal States. It would lose its value if I had to regard it as a union held together by physical force. I would be happy to know that every State now felt that fraternity which made this Union possible, and, if that evidence could go out, if evidence satisfactory to the people of the South could be given that that feeling existed in the hearts of the northern people, you might burn your statute books and we would cling to the Union still."

Instead of conspiring to disrupt the Union, as has been charged, Mr. Davis loved this great Republic with passionate arder and sealed that devotion with his richest blood. He served his country with a conscientious fidelity that knew no flagging. He went out at last in obedience to what he felt was imperative necessity, and the going almost broke his great heart. So reluctant was he to the going almost broke his great heart. So reluctant was he to sever relations with the Union that some more ardent friends became impatient with his hesitation and almost suspected his loy-alty. Despairing of any fair and final adjustment of issues that had agitated the Nation for more than a half century, and believing that the election of Mr. Lincoln would embolden his party to great aggressions upon the constitutional rights of the Southern States, he at length, with many a heartache, yielded to the inevitable and joined his people in the establishment of a separate civil government.

On January 20, in a letter to his special friend ex-President Franklin Pierce, he thus expressed the grief of his patriotic heart: "I have often and sadly turned my thoughts to you during the troubulous times through which we have been passing, and now I come to the hard task of announcing to you that the hour is at hand which closes my connection with the United States, for the independence and union of which my father bled, and in the service of which I have sought to emulate the example he set for my guidance." my guidance.

As Mr. Blaine justly said of L. Q. C. Lamar, so will history say of Jefferson Davis: "He stood firmly by his State in accordance with the political creed in which he was reared; but looked back with tender regret to the Union whose destiny he had wished to share, and under the protection of whose broader nationality he had hoped to live and die."

consistent was his entire public career, and so con-And so consistent was his entire public career, and so conspicuous the unstained purity of his motives, that when nearing the close of his eventful life, he could challenge the world and triumphantly say: "The history of my public life bears evidence that I did all in my power to prevent the war; that I did nothing to precipitate collision; that I did not seek the post of Chief Executive, but advised my friends that I preferred not to fill it."

Long after Yancey and Rhett and Toombs and others had thrown hesitancy to the winds Mr. Davis still wrought with all his great ability and influence to preserve the Union. He favored and earnestly advocated the "Crittenden Resolutions" on condition that the Republican Members accept them. Had they not stubbornly re-

Republican Members accept them. Had they not stubbornly refused—and they did it on the advice of Mr. Lincoln—war would have nused—and they did it on the advice of Mr. Lincoln—war would have been averted and the dissolution of the Union prevented or postponed. All the undoubted facts go to prove that Jefferson Davis, at the peril of sacrificing the confidence of his people, exhausted all resources consistent with sacred honor and the rights of the States to stay the fatal d'smemberment of the Union.

Jefferson Davis' farewell to the United States Senate, in which he had so long towered as a commanding figure and where he had rendered his country such distinguished service, was one of the most dramatic and memorable scenes in the life of that historic Chamber. Mississippi, by solemn ordinance and in the exercise of her sovereign right, had severed her relation with the Union, and he, as her repre-sentative, must make official announcement of the fact, surrender his high commission, and return home to await the further orders of his devoted people. It was a supreme—a fateful hour—in our country's history. The hush of death fell upon the Chamber when Jefferson Davis arose. The trusted leader and authoritative voice of the South was about to speak, and an anxious Nation was eager to hear. Every Senator was in his seat, Members of the House stood in every available place, and the galleries were thronged with those whose faces expressed the alternating hopes and fears of their patriotic hearts. The fate of a nation seemed to hang upon that awful hour.

Pale, sad of countenance, weak in body from patriotic grief and loss of sleep, evidently under the strain of sacred, suppressed emotion, and yet with the calmness of fixed determination and settled conviction, the majestic Senator of Mississippi stood, hesitant for morphylating and the strain of th conviction, the majestic Senator of Mississippi stood, hesitant for a moment, in painful silence. The natural melancholy in his face had a deeper tinge "as if the shadow of his country's sorrow had been cast upon it." His good wife, who witnessed the fateful scene, and felt the oppressive burden that almost crushed the brave heart of her great husband, said that "Had he been bending over his bleeding father, needlessly slain by his countrymen, he could not have been more pathetic and inconsolable." At first there were a slight transcript in the recent husband had been considered by there was a slight tremor in his speech, but as he proceeded his voice recovered its full, flutelike tones, and rang through the Chamber with its old-time clearness and confident strength. But Chamber with its old-time clearness and confident strength. But there was in it no note of defiance, and he spoke no word of bitterness or reproach. He was listened to in profound silence. Hearts were too sad for words and hands too heavy for applause. Many eyes, unused to weeping, were dimmed with tears. And when he closed with these solemn words, there was a sense of unutterable sorrow in the entire assembly: "Mr. President and Senators, having made the announcement which the occasion seemed to me to require, it only remains for me to bid you a final adieu." Senators moved softly out of the Chamber, as though they were turning away from a new-made grave in which were laid their dearest hopes. Mrs. Davis says that the night after this memorable day brought no sleep to his evelids, and all through laid their dearest hopes. Mrs. Davis says that the night after this memorable day brought no sleep to his eyelids, and all through its restless hours she could hear the oft-reiterated prayer: "May its restless hours she could hear the oft-reiterated prayer: "May God have us in His holy keeping, and grant that before it is too late peaceful councils may prevail."

In this open, manly, but painful way, the Southern States withdrew, with never a suggestion of conspiracy against anything or anybody. The men of the South wore no disguises, held no secret councils, concealed no plans, concocted no sinister schemes, organized no conclaves, and adopted no dark-lantern methods. They spoke out their honest convictions, made their pathetic pleas for justice, and openly announced their final, lamented purpose if all efforts at a peacful adjustment should fail. And at length, whether wisely or unwisely, feeling that nothing else would avail, they determined to take the final step and fling defiance to the face of what they considered an aggressive, overbearing, tyrannous majority. As Alexander H. Stephens admirably and correctly says, the real object of those who resorted to secession "was not to overthrow the Government of the United States, but to perpetuate the principles upon which it was founded. The object in quitting the Union ples upon which it was founded. The object in quitting the Union was not to destroy but to save the principles of the Constitution." And it is a significant fact, that the historic instrument, in almost its exact language, became the organic law of the Confederate Government. The Southern States withdrew from the Union for the very reason that induced them at first to enter into it; that is, for their own better protection and security.

their own better protection and security.

Secession was not a war measure; it was intended to be a peace Secession was not a war measure; it was intended to be a peace measure. It was a deeply regretted effort on the part of the South to flee from continued strife, feeling that "peace with two governments was better than a union of discordant States." Hence Greely himself said: "If the Cotton States shall decide that they can do better out of the Union than in it, we insist on letting them go in peace." And, while fearing the direful possibility, the Southern States seceded without the slightest preparation for war. As Dr. J. L. M. Curry said: "Not a gun, not an establishment for their manufacture or repair, nor a soldier, nor a vessel had been provided as preparation for war, offensive or defensive. On the contrary, they desired to live in peace and friendship with their late confederates and took all the necessary steps to secure that desired result. There was no appeal to the arbitrament of arms nor any provocation to war. They desired and earnestly sought to make a fair and equitable settlement of common interests and disputed questions." And the very first act of the Confederate Government was to appoint commissioners to Washington to make terms of peace and establish relations of amity between the sections.

Some days after his farewell to the Senate Mr. Davis returned to his home in Mississippi to await results and render any service to which his country might call him. He did not, however, desire the leadership of the Confederacy that was in process of organization. But the people who knew his pre-eminent abilities and trusted his leadership declined to release him. By a unanimous and enthusiastic vote he was elected to the Presidency of the and enthusiastic vote he was elected to the Presidency of the young republic, and felt compelled to accept responsibilities from which he hoped to escape. It was the thought of his countrymen, voiced by the eloquent William L. Yancey, that "the man and the hour have met." He could well say, therefore, in his inaugural address, delivered a few days after, that "It is joyous in the midst of perilous times to look around upon a people united in heart, when one purpose of high resolve animates and actuates the whole; when the sacrifices to be made are not weighed in the balance against honor and right and liberty and equality." His address was conservative and dispassionate, but strong and resolute, not unequal to the luminous and lofty utterance of Thomas Jefferson. If others failed to measure the awful import of that epochal hour, not so the serious and far-seeing man about to assume high office, who was at once an educated and trained soldier sume high office, who was at once an educated and trained soldier sume high office, who was at once an educated and trained soldier and a great statesman of long experience and extraordinary genius. To rehearse in detail the well-known story of carnage and struggle is not within the purpose of this discussion. Nor is it necessary to consider at length the many and perplexing problems which signalized the administration of the young Nation's first and only President. It is sufficient to say that he conducted the affairs of the stormy government with consummate wisdom, meeting the sternest responsibilities, awed by no reverses, discouraged by no disaster, and cherishing an unshaken faith that a cause could not fail which was "sanctified by its justice and sustained by a virtuous people." Even after Richmond was evacuated and the sun of Appomattox was about to go down amid blood and tears, a final appeal was issued in which he said: "Let us not despair, my countrymen, but meet the foe with fresh defiance and with unconquered and unconquerable hearts."

despair, my countrymen, but meet the foe with fresh defiance and with unconquered and unconquerable hearts."

Mr. Davis was a great President. In administering the affairs of the Confederate Government he displayed remarkable constructive and executive genius. Considering the resources at his command, all the southern ports blockaded and without the recognition of any foreign nation, with no opportunity to sell cotton abroad and import supplies in return, having to rely entirely upon the fields and strong arms of the homeland, and constantly menaced by one of the greatest armies of the world, it was remarkable that the young nation could have survived a few months, instead of 4 memorable years. And much of that wonderful hisstead of 4 memorable years. And much of that wonderful history is due to its Chief Executive. In answer to one who sought General Lee's estimate of Mr. Davis as the head of the government, he thus replied: "If my opinion is worth anything, you can always say that few people could have done better than Mr. Davis. I know of none that could have done as well."

And on the other side hereb criticism is giving way to generous ment, he thus replied: "If my opinion is worth anything, you can always say that few people could have done better than Mr. Davis. I know of none that could have done as well."

And on the other side harsh criticism is giving way to generous and discriminating judgment. The Honorable Charles Francis Adams in a recent review of the latest Life of Jefferson Davis, which has issued from the press, pays fitting tribute to the extraordinary ability displayed by the Confederacy's great President: "No fatal mistake," says he, "either of administration or strategy, was made which can fairly be laid to his account. * * * He did the best that was possible with the means that he had at command. Merely the opposing forces were too many and too strong for him. Of his austerity, earnestness, and fidelity it seems to me there can be no more question than can be entertained of his capacity."

Mr. Davis has been charged with cruelty to prisoners, and on his shoulders have been laid the so-called "horrors of Andersonville," a charge as utterly baseless as it is despicably mean. No more humane or gentle spirit ever walked this earth than Jefferson Davis. As a matter of fact, there was no deliberate purpose on either side to maltreat prisoners of war or fail to make proper provision for their care. The sufferings endured were only the exigencies of the awful days when great armies were in the death struggle for mastery. All that humanity could suggest and the meager resources of the South could provide were freely given for the brave men captured in battle. Mr. Davis said they were given exactly the same rations "in quantity and quality as those served out to our gallant soldiers in the field, which has been found sufficient to support them in their arducus campaigns." On the contrary, goaded doubtless by false reports from the South, the Contrary, goaded doubtless by false reports from the South, "than there were Confederate prisoners in the North, 4,000 more Confederates than Federal died in prison." If those figures are correct cartel agreed upon for the exchange of prisoners. And General

Grant boldly assumed the responsibility for such refusal in these words: "It is hard on our men in southern prisons not to exchange them, but it is humanity to those left in the ranks to fight our battles. If we commence a system of exchanges which liberates all prisoners taken, we will have to fight on until the whole South is exterminated. If we hold those caught they amount to no more than dead men. At this particular time to release all rebel prisoners North would insure Sherman's defeat and compromise our own safety here."

our own safety here."

If any unfortunate prisoner was not comfortably provided for, it was not because the South would be cruel to a brother but on account of her exhausted source of supply. During the last year of the war General Lee had meat only twice a week, and his usual dinner was "a head of cabbage boiled in salt water, sweetpotates, and a pone of corn bread." If the peerless commander in chief of the Confederate armies was reduced to such scanty fare, the Government could not well provide very liberally for the gallant men in the ranks or behind prison doors.

Now, with this very imperfect sketch of a most remarkable career I shall briefly refer to some of the qualities that made this heroic history a sublime possibility.

history a sublime possibility.

He was an accomplished orator and a magnificent debater.
Having always complete mastery of himself and of the subject in hand, he became a veritable master of assemblies. He met Sargent S. Prentiss in debate, that inspired wizard of persuasive and powereful speech, and his friends had no occasion to regret the conreful speech, and his friends had no occasion to regret the contest. Stephen A. Douglass found in him the mightest champion with whom he ever shivered a lance. During an exciting discussion in 1850, Henry Clay turned to the Mississippi Senator and announced his purpose, at some future day, to debate with him a certain great question. "Now is the moment," was the prompt reply of the brilliant southern leader, whose intrepid courage and diligent student habits kept him fully armed for the issues of any hour.

"He was an archer regal Who laid the mighty low, But his arrows were fledged by the eagle And sought not a fallen foe."

One of Mr. Davis' biographers, well acquainted with his parliamentary career, who knew his mastery in debate and his superb power as a statesman and an orator, and who witnessed his brilliant gladiatorial combat in the Senate with Stephen A. Douglass, liant gladiatorial combat in the Senate with Stephen A. Douglass, gives this discriminating estimate of the great Mississippian:

"In nearly all of Mr. Davis' speeches is recognized the pervasion of intellect, which is preserved even in his most impassioned passages. He goes to the very foundations of jurisprudence, illustrates by historical example, and throws upon his subject the full radiance of that light which is shed by diligent inquiry into the abstract truths of political and moral science. Strength, animation, energy without vehemence, classical elegance, and a luminous simplicity are features in Davis' oratory which rendered him one of the most finished, logical, and effective of contemporary parliamentary speakers. * * * He had less of the characteristics of Mirabeau than of that higher type of eloquence, of which Cicero, Burke, and George Canning were representatives, and which is pervaded by passion, subordinated to the severer tribunal of intellect."

intellect."

His sensitiveness to personal and official honor, and his exceeding conscientiousness in the discharge of public duties were among the chief characteristics of this serious and stainless man. "Great politicians," said Voltaire, "ought always to deceive the people." But such was not the sacred creed of Jefferson Davis, who held that public men should invariably and scrupulously be honest with the people, having no confidences from which they are excluded and no policies in which they were not invited to share. Free from conscious sophistry and the very soul of candor, he never sought to conceal or obscure, but to make the truth so luminous that he who ran could read. His own eloquent characterization of President Franklin Pierce might be fittingly applied to Jefferson Davis himself: "If treachery had come near him it would have stood abashed in the presence of his truth, his manliness, and his confiding simplicity."

In official life he knew no word but duty. When in Congress a

In official life he knew no word but duty. When in Congress a ver and harbor bill was pending on one occasion, and seeing that combinations had been formed to secure certain local, trivial appropriations, he opposed the measure with characteristic vigor. In the course of the debate he was asked if he did not favor appropriations for Mississippi, in response to which he retorted sharply and concluded: "I feel, sir, that I am incapable of sectional distinctions upon such a subject. I abhor and reject all interested combinations."

binations.'

He was the very soul of chivalry. No plumed knight of the Middle Ages ever had higher regard for the virtue of woman or the integrity of man or the sacredness of a cause. Sensitive to wrong, cherishing above measure his stainless honor, he never in the least betrayed it nor allowed another to impugn it. Had he remained in the military service I doubt not that he would have been on the tented field what Sir Henry Havelock became to the chivalry of England.

His was a proud but a noble and affectionate nature. Some have thought him a cold, austere, severe man, lacking in the gentler elements and sympathies of a generous soul. But nothing could be further from the fact. His affections were most ardent, his friendships partook of the pathetic, and the tenderness of his heart often dimmed his eyes with tears. And he was at all times most approachable. No citizen was so poor, no soldier so humble, no man so obscure, as not to have ready access to his presence and sympathetic attention.

Mr. Davis was a statesman, with neither taste nor ability for mere political manipulation. He relied upon high argument, and not political management, to achieve the great ends for which his party stood, and for which this young republic was called into being. It was impossible for him to resort to questionable methods. being. It was impossible for him to resort to questionable includes and demagogical appeal in order to win elections and carry out and demagogical appeal in order to win elections and carry out party or governmental policies.

He was a profound, philosophical statesman, with a thoroughly trained intellect and an exalted sense of moral responsibility. In his logical processes he quite resembled the illustrious John C. Calhoun, whose genius he greatly admired and with whose political creed he was in substantial accord. And when Mr. Calhoun passed away, amid the lamentations of the whole Nation, the great party he had led with such consummate skill turned instinctively to Jefferson Davis as incomparably the ablest exponent of the basic party he had led with such consummate skill turned instinctively to Jefferson Davis as incomparably the ablest exponent of the basic principles for which they fearlessly stood. His superb and commanding leadership vindicated their generous confidence and vastly enlarged the strength and measure of his national influence.

As Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Franklin Pierce, and by common consent he was the premier in that body of statesmen; it is no disparagement of others to say that no abler or more accomplished Secretary ever sat at the council table of an American President.

President.

Providence designed him for leadership and amply endowed him Providence designed him for leadership and amply endowed him with gifts to meet its repeated exigencies and imperial responsibilities. And in every position to which he was summoned the results of his labors and the splendor of his achievements gave eloquent attention to the prescience of his statesmanship and the grandeur of his character. The verdict of history will be, notwithstanding the fall of the Confederate Government, that he was prescribed by the man for a crisis. His genius was most respendent. preeminently the man for a crisis. His genius was most resplend-ent when the clouds were darkest and the tension was greatest and the danger was nearest. When passion swayed the hour, he was in most perfect command of his highest powers and seemed to exer-cise the coolest judgment. He was cautious without timidity, intrepid without rashness, courteous with condescension, pious without pretense.

And no public man ever had more loyal support and a more enthusiastic following. The Tenth Legion of Caesar and the Old Guard of Napoleon never followed their leaders with more perfect assurance or thrilling ardor than did the friends of the superb chieftain whose one hundredth anniversary we celebrate today.

"Courage that could dare and do, Steadfast faith and honesty, Were the only craft he knew And his sole diplomacy."

Mr. Davis was a devout believer in the fundamental verities of our Christian faith, and sought to make them the inspiring rule of his daily life. He was acquainted with the scriptures from a child, and knew the place and power of prayer. His unshaken faith gave him sublime courage for duty, a serene fortitude in calamity, softened the rigor of the cruel prison, and made radiant the evening skies of life's long stormy day. His intimate friend, the eloquent Senator Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, paid this heart tribute to the beauty and consistency of his Christian character: "I know Jefferson Davis as I know few men. I have been near him in his public duties. I have seen him by his private fireside; I have witnessed his humble Christian devotions, and I challenge the judgment of history when I say no people were ever led through the fiery struggle for liberty by a nobler, truer patriot, while the carnage of war and the trials of public life never revealed a purer and more beautiful Christian character."

When after their capture his friend, the Honorable John H. Mr. Davis was a devout believer in the fundamental verities of vealed a purer and more beautiful Christian character."

When after their capture his friend, the Honorable John H. Reagan, the postmaster general of the Confederacy, was separated from him to be sent to a northern prison, while he remained at Fortress Monroe, Mr. Davis said: "My old friend read frequently the twenty-sixth Psalm; it has often given me the surest consolation." While enduring in agony and chains his imprisonment at Fortress Monroe, a cruelty that will ever be a blot upon our country's fair fame, he wrote thus cheerfully to his anxious and devoted wife: "Tarry there the Lord's leisure, be strong and He will comfort thy heart. Every day, twice or oftener, I repeat the prayer of St. Chrysostom." Again, from the dungeon he wrote to a friend: "Separated from my friends of this world, my Heavenly Father has drawn nearer to me."

And when his 2 pitlless years of imprisonment were ended, broken

And when his 2 pitiless years of imprisonment were ended, broken in health but unbroken in spirit, and when the short court proceedings were concluded in Richmond, which restored him to liberty and the bosom of his family, and a party of friends hotel foined Mrs. Davis at the hotel, the venerable chief of the lost cause turned to his old pastor and said: "Mr. Minnegarde, you have been with me in my sufferings and comforted and strengthened me with your prayers; is it not right that we now once more should kneel together and return thanks?"

After his release, in shattered health and poverty, his fortune hav-After his release, in shattered health and poverty, his fortune having gone with the cause he served and for which he suffered, but rich in the affectionate devotion of the people, who vied with each other in doing him honor, he returned to his beloved Mississippi and here spent the remnant of his heroic years. Out of fire and tempest and baptism of blood he came with an unfaltering purpose and an unclouded sky. There is something strangely beautiful in the old age of a great and good man. No sun sweeping through the opening gates of the morning has ever the radiant glory of his calm setting. Beautiful and bouyant as is the springtime, it fades before the color and splendor of the autumn. And so there is a sweet serenity and chastened beauty about the evening of a cheerful, well-spent life that far exceeds the brightness and bloom of its fair young morning. The last days of Jefferson Davis were peaceful and beautiful. They were spent in dignified retirement, cultivating the sweet companionship of books, enjoying the association of friends, and in writing a masterly exposition of the great principles of government that had been the creed of his political faith and the ground of his people's hopes. This was his last will and testament to those "who have glorified a fallen cause by the simple manhood of their lives, the patient endurance of suffering and the heroism of death."

the patient endurance of suffering, and the heroism of death."

Though never an indifferent observer of passing events, he wisely took no part in public affairs and rarely ever appeared on public occasions. When occasionally one of the numerous invitations with which he was overwhelmed was accepted, it was to speak words of encouragement and hope to his people, urging them, with stout hearts and strong hands, to labor for the largest good of our reunited country.

In a notable address before the Legislature of Mississippi in In a notable address before the Legislature of Mississippi in 1884, when in age and feebleness extreme, standing in the old hall where in the days of his splendid prime he swayed enraptured audiences as with the wand of a mighty magician, he thus spoke to the people who had ever held the highest place in his affectionate heart: "Reared on the soil of Mississippi, the ambition of my boyhood was to do something which would redound to the honor and welfare of the State. The weight of many years admonishes me that my day of actual services has passed, yet the desire remains undiminished to see the people of Mississippi prosperous and happy, and her fame not unlike the past, but gradually growing wider and brighter as the years roll away. * * Fate decreed that we should be unsuccessful in the effort to maintain and resume the grants made to the Federal Government. Our people have accepted the decree; it therefore behooves them to promote the general welfare to the Union, to show to the world that hereafter, as heretofore, the patriotism of our people is not measured by lines of latitude and longitude, but is as broad as the obligations they have assumed and embraces the whole of our ocean-broad domain."

And now, young men of our reunited country, sons of heroic sires, proud of the flag that floats over us, and jealous of its increasing and unfading glory, glad that there is a star on it that answers to the name of Mississippi, I commend to your emulation the words of solemn counsel and patriotic encouragement with which Mr. Davis concluded his masterly and monumental work, The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government: "In asserting the right of secession it has not been my wish to incite to its exercise. I recognize the fact that the war showed it to be im-the right of secession it has not been my wish to incite to its exercise. I recognize the fact that the war showed it to be impracticable, but this did not prove that it was wrong, and now, that it may not be again attempted, and the Union may promote the general welfare, it is needful that the truth, the whole truth, should be known, so that crimination and recrimination may for a very exercise and then on the basis of fragraphy and faithful record should be known, so that crimination and recrimination may forever cease, and then, on the basis of fraternity and faithful regard for the rights of the States, there may be written on the arch of the Union, 'Esto Perpetua.'"

By the sacred political convictions which had inspired his every public and patriotic service, he consistently lived to the end, and went down to his grave without laying any sacrifice of repentence upon the altar of his conscience or his country. Without compromise or modification, and with never a suggestion of contrition or concession, he died in the accepted faith of his fathers. And for that fearless and unshaken fidelity to his honest conception of truth and duty the South will continue to adore him, the world will never cease to admire him, and with a wreath of unfading glory the genius of history will not fail to crown him. For the future he had no fear. In the last public paper that emanated from his pen, representing himself and his countrymen, he calmly reiterated his unfaltering faith in these words: "We do not fear the verdict of posterity on the purity of our motives or the sincerity of our belief, which our sacrifices and our career sufficiently attested."

attested."

Had he ever recanted or even receded, had he ever apostatized or even compromised, had he shown in any way that his often reiterated doctrines were not the undying convictions of his sincere soul, had he ever plead for pardon on the ground that he had misconceived the truth and misguided his people—the South would have spurned him, the North would have execrated him, and the verdict of history would have deservedly and eternally condemned him. But, in the calm consciousness of having done what sacred duty and the cause of constitutional liberty seemed to demand, to the end of his days he walked with a steady step that knew no variableness or shadow of turning. The banner under which he fought went down in blood and tears but was never furled by his hands. hands.

And for us to be honestly and absolutely loyal to the whole country and our glorious flag, we need not and will not forget or cease to venerate the exalted character and splendid virtues and unsullied patriotism of Jefferson Davis and his compeers.

"Time cannot teach forgetfulness When grief's full heart is fed by fame."

When grief's full heart is fed by fame."

Over the portico of the Pantheon in Paris are these words in large letters, "To great men, the grateful Fatherland." Fellow Mississippians, I cannot repress the painful regret that it is not the proud privilege of Mississippi to be "the grateful fatherland" of the greatest Mississippian, and to keep holy watch and ward over the sacred dust of her most illustrious son. He was great to those who knew him best—those who were nearest to him in intimate, confidential companionship, and he will grow greater with the growing years. Caleb Cushing, in introducing him to a vast audience in Faneuil Hall, said he was "eloquent among the most eloquent in debate, wise amongst the wisest in council, and brave among the bravest in battle." Senator Reagon, of Texas, the Postmaster General of the Confederate Government, said, "He was a man of great labor, of great learning, of great integrity, of great purity." The great-hearted and marvelously eloquent Senator, Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, said: "I declare to you that he was the most honest, the truest, gentlest, bravest, tenderest, manliest man I ever knew."

Greatest of Mississippians, the leader of our armies, the defender

Greatest of Mississippians, the leader of our armies, the defender of our liberties, the expounder of our political creeds, the authoritative voice of our hopes and fears, the sufferer for our sins, if sins they were, and the willing martyr to our sacred cause, we shall ever speak his name with reverence and cherish with patriotic pride the story of his matchless deeds. He died without citizenship here, but he has become a fellow citizen with the heroes of the skies.

Marvelous, many-sided, masterful man, his virtues will grow brighter and his name be writ larger with each passing century. Soldier, hero, statesman, gentleman, American—a prince of Christian chivalry, the uncrowned chief of an invisible republic of loving and loyal hearts—when another hundred years have passed, no intelligent review will fell to press him and no particitic heard will intelligent voice will fall to praise him, and no patriotic hand will refuse to place a laurel wreath upon his radiant brow.

"Nothing need cover his high fame but heaven, No pyramid set off his memories But the eternal substance of his greatness. To which I leave him."

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from committees:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1, 1939.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,

Speaker of the House of Representatives,

United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In view of my election to an exclusive committee, I hereby tender my resignation from the following committees: Claims, Public Lands, Revision of Laws, and Territories. Yours sincerely,

CLYDE T. ELLIS

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in two respects: First, on the subject of Chile and good will to South America; and second, to incorporate a statement made by my secretary, Seymour Guthman, before the B'nai B'rith, on religious tolerance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, last week we heard a great deal about a gag rule on the so-called Townsend bill, mostly from those who favored the Townsend bill. I opposed that rule in the committee and opposed it on the floor because I do not believe in that kind of a gag rule. Yet today we are called upon to have another gag rule on the proposed amendments to the wage and hour law. This House voted that proposition down on a previous occasion, yet it is back here today in practically the same form.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COLMER. I am sorry; I have only a minute.

This House has a right to legislate today on this proposal just as it had a right to legislate the other day upon the Townsend bill. I hope the House will see that that is done when it is given that opportunity today.

There is no justification either in expediency or justice for legislation as important as this legislation is to be considered by this House under the suspension route with 20 minutes to the side for debate and no opportunity for amendments. This is the most obnoxious form of gag rule. I am opposed to that manner of legislating.

Will anyone take the floor to argue in behalf of such gag procedure? I do not think they will. This House is a legislative body. Will the House say by its vote today that it is not willing to trust itself? Will anyone answer the question why the Labor Committee should not come before the Rules Committee and ask for a rule on this important legislation, which is the ordinary procedure in similar cases? Is the committee afraid of an open rule that would give the House an opportunity to fully discuss and amend the law if it saw I am not saying that I oppose these amendments. Neither am I prepared to say that there are not some other amendments that would be justifiable. It simply resolves itself down to a question of whether the Labor Committee is going to legislate or whether the House is going to legislate. And in this connection, let me say that I have taken it upon myself to poll a majority of the members of the Rules Committee and have their assurances that if the chairman of the Labor Committee will apply for a rule an open rule will be granted. The membership of this House has the opportunity to answer these questions when the vote is taken in a few minutes on the question of ordering a second to the motion to suspend the rules. If you vote this second down the responsibility is then upon the Labor Committee to apply before the Rules Committee and seek such a rule. [Applause.]

DESIGNATION OF AMERICA AS A NATIONAL HYMN

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution to designate America a national hymn, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point.

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, as many of you will remember, on March 3, 1931, our immortal national anthem, The Star-Spangled Banner, was recognized by statute. This was, indeed, a fitting tribute to Francis Scott Key's musical picture of the inspiration of our flag to the defenders of Fort McHenry during the War of 1812.

Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a resolution to designate our other outstanding national song, America, as our national hymn. Since it has been recognized unofficially for so many years and since it will live forever in the hearts of the American people, I think we should give it official recognition.

Students of our national ballads tell us that on a dismal February in 1832 the young student who later became the Reverend Samuel Francis Smith, was poring over some German music books. One melody attracted him because of its simple and natural movement, and glancing at the footnote, he noticed that the words were patriotic. Reverend Smith says he was "instantly inspired to write a patriotic hymn," and after a half hour's labor he completed the words which we now sing.

Smith did not know at the time the music was the same as that used by the British in God Save the King. He did not, in fact, purpose to write a national hymn, but weeks later sent his effort to Lowell Mason, a noted composer, organist, and choirmaster, who recognized it immediately as especially fitted for childish voices and children's choirs. On the following July 4 (1832), Mason directed a choir of children's voices in singing America. Soon it became sung in numerous schools, picnics, and at patriotic and semipatriotic gatherings, and was translated into Latin, Italian, German, and Swedish. On October 21, 1892, the day then celebrated as Columbus Day, the Governor of Massachusetts recommended that America be sung in all the schools of the State at an hour when all would be singing it together.

There are many references in history to this immortal hymn of our beloved land. In telling of the Rough Riders President Roosevelt told of when at an improvised open-air hospital, after the fight of Las Guasimas, in Cuba, men were suffering from painful wounds and morale was low. Suddenly Edward Marshall, a war correspondent who, nevertheless was so badly wounded that he was not expected to live, heard a soldier begin "My country, 'tis of thee." As Marshall and others joined in, the morale of the wounded, which had nearly ebbed, was restored and thoughts of returning to their homes and loved ones gave many of the injured the strength they needed to withstand death.

Scholars disagree as to the origin of the melody. Kling maintains that the English royal hymn was taken from the national Swiss hymn, written to celebrate the victory of the ancient Republic of Geneva over the troops of the Duke of Savoy in about 1602. Handtmann attempts to prove the melody of the English hymn was taken from a Silesian pilgrim song. In the early eighteenth century Lully worked it into a French patriotic song for the glorification of Louis XIV. The French claim is also supported by the testimony of three nuns of the convent of St. Cyr, who refer to it as a song used in that convent during the seventeenth century. The English version was written by Henry Carey, who also composed Sally in Our Alley. Carey introduced it as God Save Great George, Our King, in 1793 at a dinner party celebrating the capture of Porto Bello.

Other nations still have adopted the music in various centuries. In 1760 a Bavarian lutist arranged the melody for his instrument; in 1766 it appeared in the song book of the Holland Free Masons; in 1790 Harries published words to be sung in honor of the Danish King.

But whatever the origin of the music, the words are unmistakably American. That it has inspired Americans on many occasions is a matter of record. One author records that it was sung by the American soldiers while fighting the British, who sang the same tune to the words "God Save the King."

In an editorial entitled "America" by my good friend R. E. Gay, editor of the Prosser (Wash.) Record-Bulletin, Gay well states the position we should take when he says:

The tune America is dignified, patriotic, and inspiring and is sufficiently simple that anyone who can carry a tune can sing it. The criticism has been placed that this same tune is used in God Save the King, the British national anthem, and therefore it God Save the King, the British national anthem, and therefore it will not do for Americans. But to us this is an added charm. It bears evidence of the Anglo-Saxon origin of this Nation and the kinship of these two peoples—a relationship of which no one need be ashamed and of which many of us are proud.

America is big enough to have two national anthems and we would like to see Congressman KNUTE HILL sponsor a bill giving America the recognition which it deserves by placing it on an equal footing with The Star-Spangled Banner.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include therein four letters, one addressed to me by the International Labor Defense League and my reply thereto; one from the Workers Alliance by Mr. Benjamin and my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to follow:

Workers Alliance of America, National Headquarters, Washington, D. C., May 3, 1939.

Hon. Leland M. Ford,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Ford: My attention has been called to your remarks about the Workers Alliance of America and the California Workers Alliance, as they appear in volume 84, of the Congressional Record of May 1, 1939.

of May 1, 1939.

A reading of these remarks must certainly convince any informed person either that you are badly misinformed or that you are maliciously exploiting your congressional immunity in order to engage in slander, misrepresentation, and criminal libel.

Regardless of the reason for your remarks, it is my duty as an officer of the Workers Alliance of America to not only formally protest but to state categorically that your wild charges and intemperate inferences about the Workers Alliance are absolutely false and misleading. and misleading.

You state that you believe the officials of the Workers Alliance to be interested only in the hypothetical amount which they could collect as dues and initiation fees. The fact that officials of the Workers Alliance have continuously and consistently served the interests of the unemployed for many years, although the income of the organization never equaled even 1 percent of the sum you mention, should convince all fair-minded men that your belief is without any besigning all fair-minded men that your belief is without any basis in fact.

Perhaps you cannot understand such devotion to a humane cause. But the world knows that hundreds of our officers and members have given their time, their energy, and even jeopardized their freedom and their lives without a single penny of compensation or at a bare subsistence wage, in order to help improve conditions for the victims of involuntary unemployment.

You charge that we engage in strong-arm tactics, that we are taking the law into our own hands, rioting, breaking the peace, violating the law, and preaching destruction of the American form of government.

The only evidence you produce to support these serious charges are clippings from unfriendly newspapers in which six of our members are reported as having "visited the Bel-Air home of Dr. Jesse Randolph Kellems * * leader of the economy bloc in the legislature." It is this self-admitted leader of the bloc which is opposing the relief appropriation recommended by the Governor of California who describes such visits by his constituents as a resort to strong-arm tactics.

Since when has it become unlawful for people to call upon their elected officials? Since when and by whom has it been proclaimed that urging support for the recommendations of the Governor of a great State, who was elected by an overwhelming majority because of his liberalism, constitutes "preaching destruction of the American form of government"?

Third. You gratuitously inject the issue of communism. This is, of course, no new tactic. But you choose in that connection to make the false statement about "Lasser's and Benjamin's admission, with reference to their communistic activities." Neither Lasser nor Benjamin made any admissions that they were, as suggested by you, presently engaged in communistic activities. On the contrary, they insisted, and were able to prove, that all their activities concern only their official duties, which are in accordance with the program and democratic will of the membership of the Workers Alliance of America. Alliance of America.

Alliance of America.

In the light of the foregoing, I think it obvious that you and those associated with you are merely resorting to rather questionable subterfuge in an effort to becloud the real issue. You and your associates of the so-called economy bloc insist on reducing relief appropriations, regardless of the suffering this will cause among the people who are unemployed through no fault of their own. Perhaps you believe that this will be in the public welfare in the long run. If you do believe this, why not argue your case on that basis? Why resort to slander and prejudice?

Our organization believes that the way of President Roosevelt and the way of Governor Olson is the American way of treating with the needs of the majority of the American people.

You evidently believe that the way of Herbert Hoover and the way of former Governor Merriam is the better way. Well, the American people have tried both your way and the way of the New Deal. If you had the courage of your convictions, you would frankly and

If you had the courage of your convictions, you would frankly and honestly state that you want the people to return to the way of Herbert Hoover; and if this is what they would choose to support, you would be justified in protesting that yours is the more American way

Since you are willing to take your stand before the people on the real issue, it is you and your associates who stand convicted of trying by slander and misrepresentation to impose a policy which is in conflict with the needs and will of the American people. It is you, therefore, who are un-American. And it is of you and your associates rather than of those to whom

And it is of you and your associates rather than of those to whom you refer that we may say in your words:

"One cannot count, however, upon fair practice or a code of ethics from this reactionary group because their reactionary ethics is to accomplish their ends, regardless of what means they use."

Let me assure you, in conclusion, that the Workers Alliance of America has no fear of any fair investigation of its program, nor of the activities of its officers and members. Such invertigation can the activities of its officers and members. Such investigation can only prove that the Workers Alliance, together with all liberal and progressive forces in our Nation, are working by every legitimate, democratic means to prevent a return to the economic policies of Hoover, which bring in their trail political repression and social disorder

Very truly yours,

HERBERT BENJAMIN, General Secretary-Treasurer.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. Washington, D. C., June 5, 1939.

Mr. HERBERT BENJAMIN.

Mr. Herbert Benjamin,
General Secretary-Treasurer, Workers Alliance of America, 930 M Street NW., Washington, D. C.

My Dear Mr. Benjamin: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 3, in which you refer to remarks made by me about the Workers Alliance. In the second paragraph of your letter I note you state I might be misinformed or that I was maliciously exploiting my congressional immunity in order to engage in slander, misrepresentation, and criminal libel.

In my opinion, your letter conforms to the usual practice of the exploiting my congressional immunity in order to engage in slander, misrepresentation, and criminal libel.

In my opinion, your letter conforms to the usual practice of the Workers Alliance to mislead and cover up. You might give that letter to somebody who did not know the Workers Alliance or who had not had any experience, but I know your group, as I had experience with them for 3½ years in Los Angeles County. I know the things they do and I know how they work, so you cannot put over the ideas on me that you tried to put over in your letter. If you were in close contact with your Workers Alliance group in California they would so inform you, because after they threatened me in Los Angeles County; they were thoroughly whipped and finally realized it; and my prediction is that you are going to be thoroughly whipped in the United States from one end to the other.

In the fourth paragraph of your letter you would insinuate that you do not collect initiation fees and dues. I know that in Los Angeles County your own people told us that they collected initiation fees and dues from the paupers of Los Angeles County. While they did not use the term "pauper," that is exactly what they were doing, because the people in question who were being talked about were the unemployable indigents. Therefore that was the ground for my opinion that the Workers Alliance had become the parasite of the poor, and, as I told Zucas, the representative that you sent for my opinion that the Workers Alliance had become the parasite of the poor, and, as I told Zucas, the representative that you sent out from New York City, "it was the Workers Alliance that was taking the babies' milk away from the pauper." I can understand devotion to a humane cause, but of the thousands of Workers Alliance that appeared before me as an officer of Los Angeles County my opinion is that they are the biggest bunch of racketeers that ever got together in one group.

With reference to Communists, Larue McCormick, a registered Communist in that county, was one of the leaders. The testimony of Lasser before the recent congressional committee, in my opinion, tells exactly what he is and in my further opinion the testimony tells exactly what he is, and in my further opinion the testimony exposes your friends as a communistic group.

Your group howled to heaven about their constitutional right to

Your group howled to heaven about their constitutional right to free speech, free movement, and freedom in this country. Then the same group who howled for these things for themselves attempted to deny legislators or governmental officials the right to exercise their own free judgment. The best proof of this is in my own case, when the Workers Alliance group threatened that I would never leave the building if I did not change my vote. That same group stormed my office and attempted to keep me from going out of the building. They wanted to know, before I started to go out, what my answer would be. However, I did pass through them, and a day or two following, when they attempted to interfere with the board members of the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors in the performance of their duties, I was compelled to call the sheriff's office to throw them out.

You say the only evidence I produced to show that your outfit office to throw them out.

You say the only evidence I produced to show that your outfit engaged in "strong-arm tactics," "took the law into their own hands," "rioting, breaking the peace, violating the law, and preaching destruction of the American form of government," was from clippings from unfriendly newspapers. From my past experience it appears to me that you draw your usual Workers Alliance conclusion, which conclusions, in my opinion, are, 9 times out of 10, wrong. I was quoting from my own experience with your outfit, wherein they were so un-American that they refused to abide by the American form of government and were actually going to take over the government in Los Angeles County if they could.

You ask, "Since when has it become unlawful to call on elected officials?" To my knowledge, it never has been unlawful to call on efficials? To my knowledge, it never has been unlawful to call on officials in an orderly manner; but my contact with the Workers Alliance has been that they usually come in menacing groups; they never request anything, but they demand everything; and along with their demands go their threats, either of a sit-down strike or of property or personal injury. I do not get this out of any newspaper, but I know these facts from my own personal experience with your representatives in Los Angeles County; and my opinion is there is not room for this type of lawbreaker in the United States.

You refer to "subterfuge" of the "economy bloc." If you mean that group of American officials who are not afraid to tell you fellows where to get off, and who cannot be intimidated by racketeers, but tell them that, so far as they are concerned, their racket is at an end and that the taxpayer is going to be given consideration against any group of racketeers, you will always find me lined up against any unlawful group, because I will never vote one cent of public money to carry on a program of sit-down strikes, agitating, or rioting in mobs before Government officials.

Very truly yours,

Honorable Sir: Our organization wishes to go on record as opposing H. R. 5138, an omnibus bill introduced by Congressman SMITH of Virginia.

Analysis of this bill reveals that it contains a criminal syndicalism law, provisions for the registration and fingerprinting of aliens, and the provision of concentration camps for undeported aliens.

We ask that you vote against this bill, which is unparalleled in its viclousness.

We also oppose H. R. 5643, the Hobbs concentration camp bill which, to quote from Congressman Celler's speech, "is in variance with the American tradition of due process of law."

We further ask that you vote against the group of antialien bills Nos. H. R. 1650, S. 407, S. 408, S. 409, S. 410, S. 411, respectively, all of which would hamper and oppress not only aliens but the entire labor and progressive movement.

The entire group of bills referred to above are of a Fascist nature and have no place in a Government founded on the principles of liberty and democracy.

Very truly yours,

LARUE MCCORMICK Executive Secretary, International Labor Defense, Southern California District.

DEAR MADAM: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter dated April 20, 1939. I would have answered this letter sooner but have had a serious illness that kept me away from the office. Upon my return I found it.

I note that your organization is opposing, and asks me to oppose, H. R. 5138, H. R. 5643, H. R. 1650, S. 407, S. 408, S. 409, S. 410, and

S. 410, to provide for the deportation of aliens subsisting on relief under certain circumstances, and S. 411, to provide for the deportation of aliens inimical to the public interest.

I could see where you personally, and probably your organization, International Labor Defense, inasmuch as you are one of its officers, would oppose these bills, as you are Communist, being one of the few Communists that openly register as one and run for office under the Communist banner, as you did in the last November election.

I do not want to appear to be discourteous to you in consideration of your request, but inasmuch as you apparently believe in the communistic principles and I do not believe in any of the communistic principles, nor do I believe in the Fascist principles, nor the Nazi principles, nor the Socialist principles, my belief is exactly opposite to yours. I therefore must tell you very frankly and very freely that I would be for every one of those bills and advocate their passage to protect that thing which apparently you do not care as much about as I do, that is, Americanism.

Every single one of the bills you ask me to oppose stands for and will protect that Americanism, and so far as I am concerned, I propose to protect it and stand for it to the last ditch and I can assure you that when you ask me to oppose bills of this nature, due to our opposite political philosophies I can never support any such request.

Very truly yours,

L. M. Ford.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a very brief editorial from the Denver Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARNESS] over the National Broadcasting System.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I find much misapprehension in my State as to our method of appropriating money for flood control and river and harbor improvements. I wrote a letter to our colleague, the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and asked him to state the law and the practice, which he has done in a letter addressed to me.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this letter may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES, Washington, D. C., May 25, 1939.

Hon. Walter M. Pierce,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Replying to your letter of May 24, inquiring as to the method by which the money is allocated at the present time for navigation and flood-control improvements, I beg to say time for navigation and flood-control improvements, I beg to say that under the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, the President is required to transmit to Congress on the first day of each regular session, the Budget, which shall set forth in detail, among other things, estimates of the expenditures and appropriations necessary in his judgment for the support of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year.

There was created under this act the Bureau of the Budget, to which Bureau all departments of the Government submit their estimates. I am advised by the Chief of Engineers that estimates for new work and maintenance on projects heretofore adopted for payigation and flood-control improvements are submitted in Occ.

for new work and maintenance on projects heretofore adopted for navigation and flood-control improvements are submitted in October of each year, and that hearings are usually held by the Bureau on them in November. When the Budget reaches Congress it carries lump-sum estimates for new work and maintenance on navigation work, and separate estimates for Fort Peck Dam and Bonneville Dam. The estimates for flood-control work are divided as follows: Mississippi River and tributaries; emergency work on tributaries of Mississippi River; Sacramento River, Calif.; and projects in act of 1936 and amendments thereto.

Hearings are held on these estimates by the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses during which the United States engineers submit statements showing how proposed lump-sum appropriations mittees of the two houses during which the United States engineers submit statements showing how proposed lump-sum appropriations will be allocated. The engineers, however, under the law, are not required to follow these statements in making allocations. The wording of the provision in the War Department Civil Appropriations Act is as follows: "For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation * * *."

interest of commerce and navigation * * *."

I might add that the engineers do follow pretty closely the statements furnished the Committees on Appropriation in making allotments; also, that when our committee had jurisdiction over appropriations we found it advisable to allow them considerable leeway in making allotments so that they could maintain a fund for emergency work, such as that caused to important works by storms.

Trusting that this explanation is satisfactory, and with kind regards, I am, Very sincerely,

J. J. MANSFIELD, Chairman. WHEN A-TRAVELING YOU GO, VISIT OREGON, THE AIR-CONDITIONED VACATION LAND

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute and to include in my remarks a message from the Governor of Oregon.

LXXXIV-417

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, summer is upon us, and it is hoped that before a great while the Congress will have completed its business so we may go home. I have taken the liberty of sending to each of you, my colleagues, a little booklet entitled "Drive Oregon Highways," which will give you a glimpse of what Oregon has to offer to the vacationist. I trust you will peruse it and come to Oregon soon and enjoy our hospitality.

Many of you, no doubt, will be vacationing sometime this summer or fall. When a-traveling you go, come to Oregon, the air-conditioned vacation land, on the most western rim of continental United States, out where the West begins. I am sure that you will visit the superb Golden Gate International Exposition now in progress in San Francisco. If you do, you will want to go or return by the Pacific Northwest. There you will find hundreds of miles of fine, smooth, hardsurfaced highways leading through virgin forests, along rugged seashores, and by mountain streams and beautiful lakes. These lakes and streams are stocked with game fish which will test your abilities as fishermen. You may try your luck in the sport of kings with rod and line, matching skill with the Royal Chinook salmon or steelhead trout, or you may enjoy alpine climbing or skiing on the many snow-clad peaks in our rugged mountain ranges.

The Oregon Trail Highway, leading through the Columbia Gorge to the sea will be of special interest. The Columbia River, the second largest river in the United States and the only one in our Nation that cuts its way through two mountain ranges to find an outlet in the sea, was followed by Lewis and Clark in 1804 in their memorable journey of exploration. You will want to retrace their footsteps.

The Coast Highway for 300 miles leads along the Pacific shoreline, jutting back inland here and there to avoid impassable crags and cliffs, then passing along sheer precipices overhanging the sea with the white-capped surf pounding the rock ledges below. The road leads through tunnels in places too precipitous to conquer otherwise. The rivers are spanned by five modern bridges-models of graceful bridge architecture. Along the highway are many towns and beach resorts with sandy bathing beaches where surf bathing may be enjoyed.

In eastern Oregon extensive wheat fields, irrigated areas with diversified farming, and on the uplands, stock farms with great herds of sheep and cattle will demand your attention. In the Hood River Valley, the Willamette Valley, and in southern Oregon will be found extensive commercial orchards of apples, pears, peaches, cherries, and small fruits and berries. In the Willamette Valley and on the coast extensive dairy farms also abound. You will also find flax, hops, and numerous other products of the field in this diversified agricultural State

Oregon is an ideal retreat for the vacationist who desires to leave the beaten pathways and lose himself in the deep woods or by the side of a mountain lake or the rugged seashore and commune with nature. Our far-famed Oregon caves, with miles of beautiful, weird underground caverns; Crater Lake, nestling in the pit of an extinct volcano 6,000 feet up on the top of a mountain range, with deep blue water 2,000 feet or more deep, stocked with trout; and Timberline Lodge perched on the side of majestic Mount Hood, up under the stars, where summer snow and forests meet, will all intrigue you. The immense virgin forests of cedar, pine, fir, hemlock, and redwood will cause you to linger and enjoy the beauties of the woodland. The awe-inspiring redwoods, the oldest living things on earth, are there for your inspection and admiration. Some of these giants of the forests were growing when Christ was born in the manger. Wildlife abounds on every hand. You will see in their native habitat the vanishing antelope, Nature's swiftest creatures, the majestic elk, and the graceful deer.

Two hundred thousand automobiles from other States and countries, bringing 600,000 visitors, came to Oregon last year. Many thousand more came by air, water, rail, and bus line. You will find the latchstring on the outside and a welcome from all of us who reside on the Pacific shores. Our Governor, Hon. Charles A. Sprague, recently extended a welcome to you all, and I desire to include it as a part of my remarks. Governor Sprague said:

WELCOME TO VACATIONISTS

It gives me pleasure to extend a personal invitation to vacationists throughout the United States to come to Oregon this summer and see at first hand the Nation's biggest and newest vacation land.

Oregon is better prepared than ever before this year to make your stay a truly memorable event. Our network of paved highways is at a high point of efficiency to enable you to find the exact kind of recreation you like best.

The Oregon Coast Highway skirts 300 miles of rugged coast line and beautiful beaches, or you may prefer to explore the high Cascades, literally crowded with lakes and swift running and well stocked fishing streams. East of the mountains the highways lead you to the dude ranches, pine forests, and still more mountains.

mountains.

I think you will enjoy Crater Lake National Park or the sports on Mount Hood. New Timberline Lodge on Mount Hood is the center for a vacation unexcelled in its infinite variety. You can golf or ski in mid-July on Mount Hood.

But Oregon has something else to offer the vacationist. Its scenery, resorts, fishing, hunting, and beaches would be less attractive were they not accompanied by Oregon's friendliness and sincere desire to make your stay a memorable one.

Again I invite you to Oregon, because I know you will like our State and will be leath to leave it.

AMENDMENT OF THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in asking for this time at this moment is to advise the House that in another body a rather unprecedented proceeding relative to proposed amendments to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act has been had.

The House Military Affairs Committee has been holding hearings every hour it was possible to do so on an identical amendment, which was passed a few weeks ago by the Senate.

We are ready to go into executive session for consideration of amendments to the bill, and it is my view that the House of Representatives ought not to take any action upon any of these proceedings until the committee has had an opportunity to present its reasons and arguments as to why its bill should be considered.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. May] when his committee proposes to bring before the House legislation to take the profits out of war?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I would say in answer to the gentleman from New York that I enjoyed very much last night the joint debate between him and some distinguished Senators on the subject of taking the profits out of war. My committee during the last Congress considered for weeks in open hearings the question of taking the profits out of war, and reported what we believed then and what I believe now to be a perfect bill for that purpose. It was not a bill, however, to disrupt and destroy private industry in this country, and there is no bill before the committee at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to ask a question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kentucky kindly tell us when he will report out the T. V. A. bill?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, if we report out a bill on the T. V. A., we will do it either today, tomorrow, or next day.

The committee has adjourned until 3 o'clock for the purpose of enabling members to be on the floor of the House during the call of the Consent Calendar today. We meet again with the last witness on the witness stand for slight additional cross-examination, and as soon as we can get it settled in the minds of the committee, which is giving careful consideration to the bill, it will be reported.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the chairman of my committee that if we are going to report out this bill and are going to do it promptly, then I should prefer that procedure to the one followed in the Senate, but I undertake to say that the action taken in the Senate is not without precedent, especially in view of the fact that this is an emergency and must be acted on by June 20 if it is of any value.

Therefore, in view of the long delay and the hearings that have dragged along for 6 or 8 weeks, I think we ought to immediately report out the bill. All parties affected by the contract involved are agreed. There is no need to rehash the entire history of T. V. A. If this bill is not reported out tomorrow, then we ought to take up the Senate amendment.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, In answer to the gentleman from Texas I must say he is entirely wrong in stating there has been any delay because the general committee and the subcommittee have, since the bill was introduced about 6 weeks ago, held 32 meetings, and furthermore there is no occasion for speed as suggested by the gentleman from Texas.

There is much talk about a supposed emergency on account of a date fixed in the contract for its closing. Both parties to the contract-T. V. A. and Commonwealth & Southernhave said they want the agreement carried out, and both competent to make the agreement can surely agree to an extension, but the whole trouble is that some people do not want the House committee to bring the facts to the attention of the House-and that I am determined to do. That is all I have to say.

THE CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. Today is Consent Calendar day, and the Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

R. 3224) creating the Louisiana-Vicksburg Bridge Commission; defining the authority, power, and duties of said commission; and authorizing said commission and its successors and assigns to purchase, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Delta Point, La., and Vicksburg, Miss.

owner of any such lands, on any interest therein, whenever the Secretary of the Interior finds it to be advantageous to the Indian owner to do so.

SEC. 2. That all lands owned in whole or in part by restricted Quapaw Indians, including those tracts in which there may be undivided interests acquired by others, may be leased for business, mining, or other purposes in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and not otherwise: Provided, however, That no lease, modifications, or assignment thereof shall be made over the written protest of adult Indians owning a majority interest therein.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 3, strike out lines 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof "That said restricted tracts of land or any part thereof."

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

CLOSER AND MORE EFFECTIVE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN AMERICAN REPUBLICS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5835, to authorize the President to render closer and more effective the relationship between the American Republics.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to render closer and more effective the relationship between the American Republics, the President of the United States is hereby authorized, subject to such appropriations as are made available for the purpose, to utilize the services of the departments, agencies, and independent establishments of the Government in carrying out the reciprocal undertakings and cooperative purposes enunciated in the treaties, resolutions, declarations, and recommendations signed by all of the 21 American Republics at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Peace, held at Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1936, and at tenance of Peace, held at Buenos Aires, Argentina, in 1936, and at the Eighth International Conference of American States held at Lima, Peru, in 1938.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, after line 4, insert the following:

The President is authorized to create such advisory committees as in his judgment may be of assistance in carrying out the undertakings of this Government under the treaties, resolutions, declarations, and recommendations referred to, but no committee or member thereof shall be allowed any salary or other compensation for services: Provided, however, That they may, within the limits of appropriations made available therefor by the Congress, which appropriations are hereby authorized, be paid their actual transportation expenses and not to exceed $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses while away from their homes in attendance upon meetings under instructions from the Secretary of

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, that the spelling of the word "appropriations", in line 13, on page 2, may be corrected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. Wolcorr: Page 2, line 13, strike out "appripriations" and insert "appropriations."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAPAGO INDIAN RESERVATION IN ARIZONA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5758, to add certain lands to the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 2149 for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to purchase for the use and benefit of the Papago Indians with any funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated pursuant to authority contained in section 5 of the act of June 18, 1934 to authority contained in section 5 of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), notwithstanding any general limitation in acts making such appropriations against the use of the appropriated funds for the acquisition of lands outside of Indian reservations in Arizona, all privately owned lands, water rights, and improvements within the south half of section 9, township 14 south, range 11 east, Gila and Salt River base and meridian, containing 320 acres, more or less, in the State of Arizona, at the appraised value of $5.570

SEC. 2. Title to the lands shall be taken in the name of the United States in trust for the Papago Tribe, and the lands, when purchased, shall become a part of the Papago Indian Reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STEFAN, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. WOLCOTT, and Mr. HEINKE objected.

CREDIT CERTAIN INDIAN TRIBES WITH EXPENDITURES FROM TRIBAL FUNDS ON INDIAN IRRIGATION WORK

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2777, to credit certain Indian tribes with sums heretofore expended from tribal funds on Indian irrigation works.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I object. Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to the passing of this bill over without prejudice.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have already objected to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] objected and the bill, therefore, goes

Mr. COCHRAN. I objected because this bill takes about $4,000,000 out of the taxpayers' pockets.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the money belongs to the Indians. Mr. COCHRAN. It is here also despite the recommendations of officials of the Government, including the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman allow the bill to go over without prejudice?

Mr. COCHRAN. I am willing to let it go over, but why let bills like this remain on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill going over without prejudice. I wish to make a statement. I do not think the gentleman from Missouri is informed on this subject. Justification for this is to be found in the act of May 18, 1916, wherein it is provided that tribal funds heretofore expended to reimburse the United States in part for irrigation construction costs on the Blackfeet, Flathead, and Fort Peck Indian Reservations in Montana should be placed to the credit of the tribes and be available for such expenditures for tribal benefit as Congress may direct.

This money does not go to the Indians, it goes into the United States Treasury subject to disposition by Congress; and the United States has already got another lien upon their lands. It is unjust not to pass this bill in behalf of these Indians who expend this money. The money in the first place was expended without their consent.

Mr. COCHRAN. If you pass this bill, you now put your left hand in the Treasury, then after you pass it, you will be ready to put your right hand in and take the cash.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is not true, because nearly every one has both hands in the Treasury all the time; why not give an Indian a chance?

Mr. COCHRAN. If the gentleman will not agree that this bill may go over without prejudice. I will object to the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I withdraw my objection to the bill's going over without prejudice.

Mr. COCHRAN. My objections to this legislation is based upon the last two paragraphs of the report signed by the Acting Secretary of the Interior, reading as follows:

While I favor the enactment of legislation of this nature I wish to call your attention to the act of June 22, 1936 (49 Stat. 1803), by the terms of which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make investigations of all Indian irrigation projects and to make adjustments of irrigation charges subject to approval by Congress. Investigations are now being made under that act, and as the reports come in they will be submitted to Congress. These reports will include a complete accounting of tribal moneys expended on irrigation projects, and it would probably be advisable to await the completion of these investigations before authorizing reimbursement of specific amounts to the various tribes.

The Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget advised under date of February 18 that a draft of a proposed bill similar to H. R. 2777, prepared by this Department for submission to Congress, would not be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY SLATTERY Acting Secretary of the Interior.

Why not follow the suggestions of the Department and wait until the investigation referred to is completed? That seems the wise thing to do because it is evident if this bill passes others will follow.

The gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR], I know, has been most active in connection with legislation beneficial to the Indians and while his whole thoughts seem to be for the Indians some of us must think of the Treasury and taxpayers. I am not going to let this legislation pass by unanimous consent but propose to follow the recommendations of the Department of the Interior and Bureau of the Budget.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has already objected.

TO INCREASE THE PUNISHMENT FOR ESPIONAGE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6075, to increase the punishment for espionage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of title I of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish esplonage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 217, U. S. C., title 50, sec. 31), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Section 1. That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense with intent or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, goes upon, enters, files over, or otherwise obtains information. injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, goes upon, enters, flies over, or otherwise obtains information concerning any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine base, coaling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp, factory, mine, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or signal station, building, office, or other place connected with the national defense, owned or constructed, or in progress of construction by the United States or under the control of the United States, or of any of its officers or agents, or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war are being made, prepared, repaired, or stored, under any contract or agreemade, prepared, repaired, or stored, under any contract or agreement with the United States, or with any person on behalf of the United States, or otherwise on behalf of the United States, or any prohibited place within the meaning of section 6 of this title; or (b) whoever for the purpose aforesaid, and with like intent or reason to believe, copies, takes, makes, or obtains, or attempts, or induces or aids another to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, induces or aids another to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, document, writing, or note of anything connected with the national defense; or (c) whoever, for the purpose aforesaid, receives or obtains or agrees or attempts or induces or aids another to receive or obtain from any person, or from any source whatever, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, or note, of anything connected with the national defense, knowing or having reason to believe, at the time he receives or obtains, or agrees or attempts or induces or aids another to receive or obtain it, that it has been or will be obtained, taken, made, or disposed of by any person contrary to the provisions of this title; or (d) whoever, lawfully or unlawfully, having possession of, access to, control over, or being intrusted with any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, or note relating to the national defense, willfully communicates or transmits or attempts to communicate or transmit the same to any person not entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it on demand to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it; or (e) whoever, being intrusted with or having lawful possession or control of employee of the United States entitled to receive it; or (e) whoever, being intrusted with or having lawful possession or control of any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, note, or information, relating to the national defense, through gross negligence permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody or delivered to anyone in violation of his trust, or to be lost, stolen, abstracted, or destroyed, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both." or both.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCormack: On page 4, after line 5, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. Whoever knowingly or willfully advocates the overthrow of government by force and violence shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both."

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered is a very important one. It was a recommendation of the special committee of which I was chairman 5 years ago, when we investigated communism, nazi-ism, and fascism, of which committee my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor], who is sitting in front of me, was also a member. It is necessary legislation which should be upon our statute books.

Under present Federal law upon the statute books the only thing of this nature made a crime is where two or more persons conspire to overthrow the Government by force and violence; and the conspiracy statute is for all practical purposes a dead-letter law, because, first, not only must a conspiracy be established, but an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy must be established and proved.

The amendment which I have offered is very carefully drafted, one that protects thoroughly the interests of everyone, and yet at the same time it is an amendment which everyone should gladly support. It provides that "whoever knowingly or willfully"—I impose the stiffest burden of proof possible upon the Government; it should be so—"whoever knowingly or willfully advocates the overthrow of government by force and violence" shall be guilty of a crime.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. Is not the language of this amendment identical with the language of a bill that 2 years ago passed the House by unanimous consent?

Mr. McCORMACK. Two years ago the Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill—that is, the Congress before the last Congress, the Seventy-fourth Congress—and that bill, whether it passed the House or not, was reported out by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is my recollection the bill was not acted on in the House. This is one of the major recommendations made by the special committee of which I was chairman. The other was the Registration of Alien Propaganda Act, which passed the House last year by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HOBBS. To which one of the classes the gentleman named did he intend to charge the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee with belonging?

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend from Tennessee?

Mr. HOBBS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. He belongs where you and I belong, on the side of American institutions and Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman has quoted me correctly; that is exactly where I stand. I am for the amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is where the gentleman has always stood.

Mr. Speaker, this is a fair amendment, it is a reasonable amendment, it is a necessary amendment; and no one should object to its adoption.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Marcantonio) there were—yeas 142, nays 4.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present, and make the point of order that a quorum is not present. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may the amendment be read again?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under present procedure that cannot be done.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question was taken; and there were—yeas 357, nays 17, not voting 56, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a speech made by the Postmaster General of the United States on the fiftieth anniversary of the Missouri Military Academy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include information which I think the Congress ought

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Thorkelson]? There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, "Court-martial General Moseley" has been featured in the press of the invisible government and in its broadcasts. Why? To destroy his character and to spread confusion among the people. The invisible government lies in its papers and in its broadcasts, and it produces lying moving pictures of conditions that have never existed. Why is this done? To spread propaganda among the people so that they will sit patiently and wait for their own destruction.

I realize that money is power, but no one can tell me that 120,000,000 real, patriotic American citizens have capitulated to the crowd in Chicago, New York City, and Washington. I know the boys out West, and if those unacquainted with them will read history it will be found that they can do their own cleaning when the proper time comes.

Hearings on un-American activities should not be held under a battery of moving-picture cameras or innumerable flashlights, for un-Americanism is not a show and should not be featured by Hollywood nit-wits. Un-Americanism or communism is an evil blight which is destroying our Nation, and those who are now engaged in it should be charged with

Who in the Federal Government gave out the information that General Moseley was to be court-martialed? Nothing was said by the same papers when the President declared the Justices of the Supreme Court suffered from senile degeneration before he dressed the Court in pink and red. His own supporters did not criticize him when he called his followers tweedledums and tweedledees when they stumbled toward sanity. Discipline and respect for law should begin at the head of the Nation, for he is the one to set an example as the commander in chief.

Of course, no one is going to court martial General Moseley for being a good, honest, patriotic officer. Such blunder would lift the scarlet cloak of the New Deal and expose the most criminal attempt to convert our country into a proletarian communistic despotism. I say, therefore, let them go to it. There will be hundreds and hundreds that will turn the heat on the Communist so that he will be driven from our shores.

Mr. Speaker, I now inform the Members of Congress that completion of a plan to convert the United States into a proletarian democracy and totalitarian state is nearly consummated. Information is now in the hands of two intelligence sources of the Federal Government, but the spoilers are not quite ready. It is necessary that all avenues to communication be closed, and there are bills drawn for that purpose. In addition to restrictions on communication, the socialistic planning board has drawn Wagner's National Health Act and the Binderup-Voorhis Monetary Control Act. The Chain-Store Tax Act will help to create confusion. When these laws are enacted they will seal the life of the Republic, for after that the people will have to fight to regain control. The only profession left free will be those who have drawn the laws, and they will have nothing to do except to view the wreck of the Republic.

The safest course for those who are involved in this subversive plan is not to follow their customary procedure to prevent disclosure, for others have the same plans and will expose them. I may also state that that income-tax squeeze will not affect the holders of these plans, for patriotism is all they have left, and that cannot be taxed, but will eventually clean the Nation of communism and those who adhere to it. To protect the innocent and dupes of the invisible government, I suggest that those implicated-apostles of "pink," "red," and "scarlet" activities—report to the President of the United States immediately, so that he may see that the law is faithfully obeyed with the power he has under his control. I further suggest that they report all Fascists and Nazis to the President and the Dies committee, for I and others have already reported the "pink," "red," and "scarlet" gentry, This I have done in order to help the President to carry out the law as set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

I also request all newspapers that are not controlled by the invisible government to print these remarks on their front pages so that the people may be informed of the facts. Much is said in daily papers about the Fascist and Nazi activities, but no mention is made of the Socialist or Communist activities. For personal information and to clear up the situation, I will pay the daily papers $2 for every Fascist and Nazi and for each of their publications that they can prove and present, if the same papers will pay me $1 for every Communist and communistic paper that I can present. This should be a good deal even for a Shylock, for I am paying 2 to 1 and will deposit $100 any time the papers accept my challenge. I am engaging in this commercialism in order to prove that the newspapers either lie or do not know what they are talking about. The people are tired of reading, hearing, and seeing the Socialist and Communist shout "Nazi" and "Fascist" to distract attention from themselves, for there is not one newspaper that can tell me intelligently what Nazi activities are, for the simple reason that Germany is a Socialist, totalitarian state.

I dare the same papers to come out for return to constitutional government, return to States' rights, restoration of rights to the people and business, for liquidation of all planning organizations that are nothing but patterns taken from communistic socialism, liquidation of all committees and organizations that are now operating subversively to transform our republican government into a communistic state. Let the papers come out and violently oppose extension of emergency and monetary power to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. Let the papers come out for gold-secured currency and investments and an embargo on all gold, so that it cannot be removed from the Treasury of the United States and shipped back to Europe; for repeal of all the trade pacts and international planning, which began with the League of Nations. Let the papers come out in full support of farmers and all national industries. If the papers will do this, they will be loyal to the United States of America and to the people and not mouthpieces for the invisible government.

A campaign should be instigated by the same papers to repeal all unconstitutional laws, which are not based upon the Constitution but instead tolerated by erroneous opinions of the Supreme Court. Constitutionality of laws should never be determined upon decisions by courts or individuals but upon the Constitution itself.

I shall now try to prove who writes some of the legislation that is introduced in Congress, and here is evidence No. 1.

It was my intention to add this evidence, but objection was raised to its inclusion.

CONFISCATION OF FIREARMS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 189, to provide for the confiscation of firearms in possession of persons convicted of felony and disposition thereof.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That at the time any person is convicted of a felony in any court of the United States, firearms and ammunition found in his possession or under his control at the time of his arrest may be confiscated and disposed of in accordance with the order of the court before which such person was tried. The court may direct the delivery of such firearms or ammunition to the law-enforcement agency which apprehended such person, for its use or for any other disposition in its discretion.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of lines 3 to 7, inclusive, and insert the following: "That when any person is convicted in any court of the United States of any of the crimes of murder, manslaughter, felonious assault, rape, killing or assaulting a Federal officer, robbery, burglary, bank robbery, killing or kidnaping in committing bank robbery or in avoiding or attempting to avoid apprehension for the commission of bank robbery or in freeing one's self or attempting to free one's self from arrest or confinement for bank robbery, transporting or causing to be transported a kidnaped person in interstate or foreign commerce, transporting or causing to be transported a stolen motor vehicle in interstate or foreign commerce, or any felony perpetrated in whole or in part by the use of firearms, or an attempt to commit any of the foregoing crimes, the court in its judgment of conviction may, in addition to the penalty or penalties prescribed by law for the punishment of such crime or crimes, order the confiscation and disposal of firearms and ammunition found in the possession or under the immediate control of such person at the time of his arrest."

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection? Mr. WOLCOTT. I am asking unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to discuss that with the gentleman. If that request is made, I shall object. I shall later ask consideration of the joint resolution under suspension of the rules.

Mr. KELLER. If there is objection, I shall do that, of Mr. WOLCOTT. There would have been an objection.

Mr. KELLER. Then, I shall move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

TONGUE INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5506, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to contract with the State Water Conservation Board of Montana and the Tongue River Water Users' Association for participation in the costs and benefits of the Tongue River Storage Reservoir project for the benefit of lands on the Tongue River Indian Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HORTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Montana just what this bill tries to do?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I may say to the gentleman that this bill was introduced at the request of the Department of the Interior. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to purchase water to irrigate lands on the Tongue River Indian Reservation. The water is to be purchased on contract from the State Water Conservation Board of Montana and the Tongue River Water Users' Association.

Let me say that ordinarily, under the law, Indians have a prior right to the use of the water upon Indian reservations, but in the Tongue River Reservation this is an exception. The only means by which these Indians may have water to irrigate their lands is by impounding the water in accordance with a scheme that has been developed by the Water Conservation Board of the State of Montana.

May I say to the gentleman from Wyoming that this does not affect his people in Wyoming at all. This simply impounds the water in Montana of the Tongue River, to the end that these Indians will have some water with which they may raise crops. If they cannot secure the water in this fashion they cannot secure it at all.

Mr. HORTON. In other words, they will be satisfied, then, to have their supplemental water supplied from water that is already impounded or is to be impounded?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is right.

Mr. HORTON. And they will not thereafter come back here with a request for additional stream flow?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will it be necessary for the Interior Department to purchase this water from the State of Montana?

Mr. O'CONNOR. A Water Users' Association dam has already been constructed there.

Mr. RICH. Who owns and controls it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The State.

Mr. RICH. Then, the gentleman wants the Federal Government to buy water from his State in order to take care of his own people?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman understands there has already been expended $1,200,000 on this project, less $360,-750.

Mr. RICH. Who spent that money?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The United States Government and the State of Montana. It is a P. W. A. project. The dam has practically all been built. What we want now is authority to enter into this contract with the Secretary of the Interior through the water conservation board to furnish the water to these Indian lands. The cost will be repaid in the course of 37 years at the rate of $9,750 per year. Further, the Government has a lien upon the land, so the Government is assured of getting this money back.

Mr. RICH. Then the contract is between the Interior Department and the State of Montana; and the Government will not have to pay any additional money into the State, but the State, in turn, will collect the money from the users of the water and return that money to the Federal Government?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is correct.

Mr. RICH. Are you sure we are going to get the money? Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course you are going to get the money. You have the best land in the world as security for the repayment of this money as well as the promise of the Indians. Mr. RICH. Yes; but people interested in such lands are always after something.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? Mr. KEAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

SAN CARLOS AND FLATHEAD INDIAN PROJECTS

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 264) to approve the action of the Secretary of the Interior deferring the collection of certain irrigation construction charges against lands under the San Carlos and Flathead Indian irrigation projects.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I believe if the gentleman understood what this bill is about he would not object to it. The Government has already suspended payments for the white people in this area. Certainly we want to give the Indians the same rights with respect to irrigation projects that the white man has, and that is all that this bill does.

The Secretary of the Interior has already deferred these payments, and this bill is simply for the purpose of approving what the Secretary has done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Bates] that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

LIMITING AUTHORITY OF CIRCUIT JUDGES TO HOLD DISTRICT COURTS AND OF DISTRICT JUDGES TO SIT IN CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2566, to limit the authority of circuit judges to hold district courts and of district judges to sit in circuit courts of appeals.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 18 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 22), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"The Chief Justice of the United States, or the circuit justice of any judicial circuit, or the senior circuit judge thereof, may, if the public interest requires, designate and assign any circuit judge of a judicial circuit to hold a district court within such circuit, when requested to do so by, or with the consent of, the senior district judge for such district."

SEC. 2. Section 120 of the Judicial Code (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 216) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 120. The Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court assigned to each circuit shall be competent to sit as judges of the circuit court of appeals within their respective circuits. The several district judges within each circuit shall also be competent to sit as judges of the circuit court of appeals, but only in the event that by reason of the disability or disqualification of one or more circuit judges, or a vacancy or vacancies in the office or offices of one or more circuit judges for such circuit, the full court at any time cannot be composed otherwise. In such event, such district judge or judges shall sit in the court according to such order or provision among the district judges as either by general or par-ticular assignment shall be designated by the court. In case the Chief Justice or an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court shall attend at any session of the circuit court of appeals, he shall preside. In the absence of such Chief Justice, or Associate Justice, the circuit judges in attendance upon the court shall preside in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions. No judge before whom a cause or question may have been tried or heard in a district court shall sit on the trial or hearing of such cause or question in the circuit court of appeals."

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, when we considered the bill increasing penalties on espionage bill a few moments ago, on which there was a roll call on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack], we tagged onto that bill, which was a rather inconsequential measure, a very important amendment making it a crime for anyone willfully or knowingly to advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government.

Without commenting on the merits of that amendment, I want to say that that kind of legislating is a very serious matter and should not be adhered to, and there should be no repetition of the procedure, if I may caution the Members, because the Judiciary Committee of the House is considering a bill of that character at this very moment. Our committee works carefully, deliberately, and, we hope, with wisdom. We may act too slowly for some impetuous, impatient Members. We recently passed, for example, the Dempsey bill, which referred to the same subject matter. Now we pass in broader terms this amendment to the Walter bill, and the amendment creates nothing but confusion, and I do hope that the Members will not amend on the floor without hearings, without deliberation general bills on the Consent Calendar, especially where the amendment is as far reaching as the McCormack amendment. This amendment is broader than it seems. It contains no judicial definitions. It leaves to a judge unlimited power to determine what is meant by "overthrow of the Government." Surely careful legislating would require at least some deliberation and inquiry as to the import and meaning and implications involved in the amendment.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. Does not the gentleman feel that the adoption of this amendment might obviate the necessity of further considering similar legislation?

Mr. CELLER. I think it would. For example, the so-called important Smith bill, which the Judiciary Committee has been wrestling with for months, might be imperiled, if I may use that term advisedly, by the passage of the so-called McCormack amendment. Our committee votes on the Smith bill tomorrow. So I simply sound this word of caution to the Members.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Was not the amendment adopted by the House an improper amendment to the bill to which it was attached?

Mr. CELLER. Unquestionably so.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. And could have been stricken out on a point of order as not being germane.

Mr. CELLER. Unquestionably so, but there seems to be a sort of hysteria sweeping the country, as well as the House, with respect to bills of this character and we are carried off our feet, in a way, and vote for these bills or for these amendments, without much ado, in a sort of fit of pseudo patriotism. I do hope the Members will exercise better judgment in the future.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say to the gentleman that we have great respect for the Committee on the Judiciary and for its ability to report out very worth-while legislation. I think the vote today penalizing the advocacy of overthrow of the Government by force was occasioned by the impatience of this House with the Judiciary Committee in not reporting out some legislation. We have been studying this question of subversive influences and activities for over a year and a half without doing anything about it, and for one I was pleased today at an opportunity to put this House on record as being against subversive influences and against any attempt to overthrow the Government by force.

Mr. CELLER. I know the gentleman wants to be fair; he is somewhat unfair showing impatience with our committee. The Judiciary Committee has been laboring incessantly on these bills. We reported only a short time ago the so-called Hobbs bill, which was passed. I objected to it, but it was passed. We are working on the Smith bill, and there are a score of other bills that we have been deliberating upon. You cannot roll these bills out like out of a gristmill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 6, after the word "judges", insert the words "and retired judges"; and in line 13, strike out the word "district."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIEN SPOUSES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5401) to provide for the naturalization of certain alien spouses of citizens of the United States, and to validate the naturalization of certain persons.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. If no one is here to explain the bill, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill is identical with one that passed this House 2 years ago. It has for its purpose simply the clarifying of a condition in existing law. Two circuit courts of appeals and the district court of the District of Columbia have given different interpretations to the so-called Cable law. All of the other courts have ruled the other way and this clarifies the situation resulting from the ruling of those two circuit courts and one district

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes: I know. The Cable Act was a wonderful piece of legislation and has met the approval of everyone who knows much about it. I refer especially to the departments and students of immigration. As I read the report, you seek to do certain things. If I remember correctly, at one time we allowed a bill to be passed granting privileges to certain aliens in this country if they had been here 6 years. That 6 years was a stop-gap requiring a man to be here upon the theory that if he had been here for 6 years and had no trouble he might be a pretty good sort of man. In this bill you seek to change that 6 years to 1 year, and make other changes. Why not let this go over until the next call of the calendar and give us a chance to go over the matter and perhaps we can agree upon it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to say this. This does not change any 6 years to 1 year. This simply puts into effect what the Cable Act was intended to do, and clarifies the confusion that has arisen by reason of the decision of the two circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But it does another thing. There was always a difference in the early days of the immigration restriction laws between concessions to male and concessions to females. More restrictions were placed against a man who was coming in, because it was maintained that a lot of girls in this country married these counts, or "no-accounts," and we always put more restrictions against the man than we did against the woman. In this law they allowed them 6 years' residence, and now you are putting that down to 1 year, and the next thing you know we will put these noaccount fellows an the same basis as our fine American girls. Let us put it over until the next call of the calendar.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman insists, I shall not

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio that the bill go over without prejudice?

AMENDING HAWAIIAN ORGANIC ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 161) to amend section 73 of the Hawaiian Organic Act, approved April 30, 1900, as amended.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 73 of the Hawaiian Organic Act, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding at the end of paragraph (i) of said section 73 the following: ": Provided, however, That any such lot not taken or taken and forfeited, or any lot or part thereof surrendered with the consent of the Commissioner, may, instead of being disposed of as hereinabove provided, be disposed of for cash and forthwith patented to any citizen of the United States, possessing the qualifications of a homesteader as now provided by law, applying therefor and who has qualified for and received a loan under the provisions of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, approved July 22, 1937, for the acquisition of a farm: And provided further, That any patent issued upon any such sale shall contain the same restrictive provisions as are now contained in a patent issued after compliance with a as are now contained in a patent issued after compliance with a right of purchase lease, cash freehold agreement, or special homestead agreements."

SEC. 2. This act shall be in force and effect from and after its passage.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. King: Page 2, after the figures "1937", insert "(U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. IV, title 7, ch. 33)."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Delegate from Hawaii.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AMENDING ACTS OF JUNE 30, 1834, AND JUNE 22, 1874, RELATING TO PURCHASE OF GOODS FROM INDIANS

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That anything contained in section 10 of the act of June 30, 1834 (4 Stat. 738), or in section 10 of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 177), now sections 68 and 87, respectively, title 25, United States Code, to the contrary notwithstanding, employees of the United States Government, including those in the Indian Service, may, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe, be permitted to purchase from any Indian or Indian organization any arts and crafts or any from any Indian or Indian organization any arts and crafts or any other product, service, or commodity produced, rendered, owned, controlled, or furnished by any Indian or Indian organization: Provided, That nothing contained in the acts of Congress above referred to shall be construed as preventing Indian employees of the United States Government, of whatever degree of Indian blood, during their term of employment or otherwise, from obtaining or receiving any benefit or benefits made available to the Indians generally or to the members of any particular tribe, under any act of Congress, nor to prevent such employees having Indian blood from being members of or receiving benefits by reason of their membership in Indian tribes, corporations, or cooperative associations organized by the Indians, when authorized by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate regulations to be promulgated by him.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "10" and insert "14"; page 2, line 3, after the word "organization", insert "Provided, however, That no employee of the United States Government shall be permitted to make any such purchases for the purpose of engaging, directly or indirectly, in the commercial selling, reselling, trading, or bartering of said purchases by the said employee: Provided further."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to modify the provisions of section 14 of the act of June 30, 1834, and section 10 of the act of June 22, 1874, relating to the Indians."

FEDERAL AID TO STATE OR TERRITORIAL HOMES FOR SUPPORT OF DISABLED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4647, to increase the amount of Federal aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States. There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," approved August 27, 1888, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 24, sec. 134), is amended by striking out in the first paragraph thereof "$120 per annum" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1 per diem."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "thereof", strike out "$1 per diem" and insert "$240 per annum."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Our membership, gentlemen, is those persons who have served their Nation and flag, be it war, peaceful invasions, floods, national emergencies, earthquakes, or what ere may befall. Our oldest member is 102, our youngest

This association has striven for enactment of a bill which would give, by law, an American flag for the casket of Regulars that would then go to their nearest of kin. We have felt keenly this would then go to their nearest of kin. We have felt keenly this pointed discrimination between men who have served during a time of war and those who have served and sacrificed in a time other than war. It is not a matter of food for empty stomachs, a roof for unprotected heads, or clothing for naked backs, but this flag—our Stars and Stripes—is the symbol of the greatest country in the world, the United States of America, and denial thereof on the casket of one group who has served the colors and presentation to another group is hard to take.

Permit me to state that there is not a mother in this Nation whose son served in the Regular Establishment who would not secure ease from her pain at the death of her son if she could hide her face in the beautiful glory of our flag; there is not a widow of a Regular but would mingle her tears with the stars and stripes on that flag as she secured solace that her man had served that a Regular but would mingle her tears with the stars and stripes on that flag as she secured solace that her man had served that flag honestly, fearlessly, and with complete freedom of mind; and there is not the son or daughter of a Regular in this Nation, gentlemen, but would look many times at the flag that covered their dead father's mortal remains and feel their heart swell that daddy, their daddy, gentlemen, had been a soldier or sailor in the service of the United States of America.

It is apropos to mention just why the Regular Veterans' Association feels so keenly about this denial of the flag to our casket. Reasons are many, some readily apparent, some obtruse, some sentimental:

sentimental:

sentimental:

1. Service personnel are the lowest paid of all Government employees—by far the lowest, receiving a pay, all allowances considered, that is far under one-half the pay of other Government employees on comparative jobs, and of civilian pursuits of like nature.

2. They have for several years now, been denied the reenlistment allowance, an allowance which has been rightly considered a part of their pay for many years. We are grateful that this Congress has seen fit to overwhelmingly vote that the allowance be resumed.

3. If these men are disabled in line of duty, and approximately 3,000 were added to the pension rolls last year, they are pensioned at a rate that is nothing short of a national disgrace being less than one-half that our war veterans receive for like disabilities.

4. If killed in line of duty, and well over 1,000 dependents of line-of-duty deceased Regulars are added to the rolls yearly, the pensions for such dependents are actually as low as but 33½ percent of comparative rates for dependents of line-of-duty deceased war veterans.

veterans

5. The disabled Regular is even denied preference to the W. P. A.

employment.
6. He is denied enrollment in C. C. C. unless within the age limit and passing physical examination, which is rather rigid.

7. He is even denied relief if drawing a small pension.

8. Bills have been introduced into this Congress which will take every vestige of civil-service preference away from all Regulars whether disabled or not.

9. Ad infinitum.

9. Ad infinitum.

It is noted in the report of the Veterans' Administration on the bill S. 947, Seventy-fifth Congress, that the cost of these flags is estimated at $7 for each flag and that the first year cost would be approximately $82,800. It is noted that the Veterans' Administration suggests that the War and Navy Departments could probably provide a more comprehensive report on the cost.

For the information of this committee, R. V. A. has contacted several manufacturers of comparable flags with a low quotation (5,000 lots) of $2.75 (wool bunting 5 by 9½) and a high quotation of $3.25 (wool bunting 5 by 9½). Basing the number of deaths on the Veterans' Administration report last year, approximately 12,000, the first year cost of flags would be but $33,000 (low quotation above) and $39,000 (high quotation above).

It is noted that the cost of storm flags is stated by the Secretary of War (S. 947, 75th Cong.) as $5.47 each. R. V. A. quotations were secured yesterday, April 13. It is assumed that the price of flags has been reduced measurably over the last year. Total cost at the Secretary of War quotation would be but $65,640 for 12,000 flags, and as indicated above, the cost of such flags is certain to have been reduced in the last year as quotations R. V. A. secured are from reputable manufacturing firms and in 5,000 lots only. It follows that a further reduced price would be secured in greater orders. R. V. A. is firmly convinced, gentlemen, that if this bill be enacted into law it will be a noticeable service morale builder, for Regulars feel that this discrimination is criterion of the lack of consideration heretofore given Regulars and that elimination of it Regulars feel that this discrimination is criterion of the lack of consideration heretofore given Regulars and that elimination of it is the forerunner to a complete consideration of the problems confronting the man behind the gun.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I wish to advise that I have been authorized to state that the Regular Veterans' Woman's Association unites with the R. V. A. in our plea for removal of this cloud of discrimination from the service and sacrifices of our Regulars.

I have also been authorized by Carl Gardner, editor, Our Army (magazine), 11 Park Place, New York, N. Y., and by H. C. Blackerby, editor, Navy News (magazine), California Theater Building, San Diego, Calif., to state to this committee their full approval of the bill, and that they strongly urge favorable consideration thereof.

NATURALIZATION PRIVILEGES TO ALIEN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5402, to admit to the United States, and to extend naturalization privileges to, alien veterans of the World War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask what this bill does. Does it give the same privilege to alien veterans or does it restrict it to any certain groups?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is veterans who fought in the American Army. It simply extends the old law that was on the statute books.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Some of those veterans have not yet qualified?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. And this is simply to keep the door open?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am very much in favor of it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the major veterans' organizations supported this measure in '26 and support the amendment now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. It is in keeping with the mandate of the various veterans' conventions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) as used in this act, the term "alien veterans" means an individual, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States at any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918, who is now an alien not ineligible to citizenship but does not include (1) any individual at any time during such period or thereafter separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions, (2) any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform, or (3) any alien at any time during such period or thereafter discharged from the military or naval forces on account of his alienage. of his alienage.

AMENDING ACT OF MARCH 2, 1929

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3215, to amend the act of March 2, 1929 (45 Stat. 536).

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN PROPERTY TO CITY OF EL CAMPO, TEX. The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5037, to convey certain property to the city of El Campo, Tex. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a Senate bill (S. 1982) may be substituted for the House bill. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to convey to the city of El Campo, Tex., all the right, title, and interest of the United States in a strip of land on the west side of the present post-office site 50 feet wide and 200 feet long between Railroad Avenue and First Street. Such conveyance shall be subject to the express condition that the land be used for street purposes.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Costello: Page 1, line 9, after the word "purposes", change the period to a colon and insert "Provided, That in the event the land in question ceases to be used for street purposes all the right, title, and interest hereby authorized to be conveyed to the city of El Campo shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That any changes in the post-office site required to be made in connection with the use of the land for street purposes shall be made to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury and without expense to the United

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the

Mr. Speaker, this is a recommendation which was made by the Department in its report to the committee upon this bill to the effect that a revocable license should be granted for street purposes rather than a conveyance. The committee considered this matter very carefully. All of the land involved in the entire site was donated by the city of El Campo to the Government without any compensation whatever.

The Post Office Department reported that the paving of this street and granting land for that purpose would in no way interfere with the postal service but would make for greater accessibility to the post office in providing for a paved street on each side. The provision is contained in the bill that such conveyance shall be subject to the express condition that the land be used for street purposes, which, in essence, is equivalent to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The land, I repeat, was conveyed without cost to the Government, and this is simply a reconveyance of a small part of it in order that all of the streets around the post office may be paved. The bill contains the limitation that the conveyance shall prescribe that it must be used for street purposes. In my opinion, after a full hearing before the committee, the amendment should not be adopted. It is rather quibbling about something of no consequence.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Texas in whose district the city of El Campo is located.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the property, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], was given to the Federal Government by the city of El Campo-given by deed of gift to the Post Office Department. It was a lot 200 feet square. This is more land than the Department needs. By cutting 50 feet off of the back side and making a street of it will provide concrete streets entirely around the post-office building whereas now there is a street on only three sides of the building. It will be to the benefit of the Post Office Department more than it will to the city of El Campo or anvone else.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. COSTELLO. The adoption of this amendment would not seriously affect the bill in any way. As I understand it, the only effect of the amendment would be that in the event the city should not desire to use this land in the future for street purposes then it would definitely revert to the Federal Government for what use they might want to put it to; in other words, should they want to change the location of the street there, which is unlikely, or should they want to redesign the post office, to enlarge it and close the street, the title would automatically revert to the Federal Government.

Mr. LANHAM. I understand that this is a new post-office building and that the other side of the proposed street is occupied by a park.

Further, with reference to use for street purposes, it seems to me protection of the Federal Government is adequately provided in the last sentence of the bill, which states:

Such conveyance shall be subject to the express condition that the land be used for street purposes

The conveyance can be worded in such way that the purpose of the gentleman's amendment will be carried out without adding the amendment to the bill.

Mr. COSTELLO. That may be true. My amendment simply makes it possible that if this area is not used for street purposes it shall revert to the Federal Government. [Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A House bill (H. R. 5037) was laid on the table.

SISSETON INDIAN RESERVATION, N. AND S. DAK.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5451, to authorize the consolidation of the lands on the Sisseton Indian Reservation, N. Dak. and S. Dak., and for other purposes

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to acquire, by gift, purchase, is hereby, authorized in his discretion to acquire, by gift, purchase, or exchange, any interest in Indian or non-Indian lands, water rights or surface rights to lands, together with improvements thereon, within the boundary of the Sisseton Indian Reservation, North and South Dakota. SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to prescribe all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, line 24, after the word "any", insert the word "tribal."

On page 3, line 5, at the end of section 3, add a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 4. At any time within 5 years after an assignment is made to an Indian, as provided in section 2 herein, the said Indian may demand and receive from the Secretary of the Interior a purchase contract for said land, or any portion thereof, of not less than 40 acres. The price specified in said purchase contract shall be the value of the said land, as arrived at for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 1 and 2 herein, and the said Indian shall be credited on his purchase contract for the value of any land or improvements relinquished or conveyed by him, in order to carry out section 1, and the balance of the purchase contract shall be paid in annual installments over a period of not to exceed 40 years, without interest: Provided, however, That the said Indian may pay the balance of his purchase price contract in a lesser period of time, if he so desires: Provided, however, That no mortperiod of time, if he so desires: Provided, however, That no mortgage, pledge, deed of trust, or other evidences of indebtedness shall be valid against a purchase contract issued pursuant hereto, and no sale or conveyances of the said purchase contract or any right thereunder made to a non-Indian shall be valid. Upon full payment of the purchase price provided in any contract for purchase, the Secretary of the Interior shall, and is hereby authorized to, execute and deliver to the owner of said contract, an absolute fee title to said land: Provided, however, That if any holder of a purchase contract shall default in his annual installments for a period of 3 years, the Secretary of the Interior may at his election and upon the giving of a 6 months' notice to the owner of said contract, in the manner provided for the service of process in a contract, in the manner provided for the service of process in a United States district court, declare the said purchase contract forfeited and all right, title, and interest to said purchase contract, the land or improvements thereon, shall revert the same as if no purchase contract had been issued: Provided, however, That no otherwise qualified Indian shall be denied the right to become an assignee under section 2 hereof by having defaulted on a purchase contract. If the owner of a purchase contract shall die, the said contract and all rights thereunder shall descend to his heirs-at-law or may be devised by will: Provided, however, That no devise, or conveyance by will to a non-Indian shall be valid."

On page 4, line 21, strike out "Sec. 4" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 5."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO CANAL ZONE RETIREMENT LAW

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1819, to amend section 92, title 2, of the Canal Zone Code and for other purposes. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that this bill proposes to renew a policy of extension in regard to retirement that the Congress decided was unwise in 1933. In addition to that it proposes to permit retirement for the first time at the very low age of 58, which would entail considerable additional cost to the Treasury of the United States, notwithstanding the conclusion reached in the majority report to the effect this law would not cost anything. Further, it puts the Government in the business of selling annuities in competition with life insurance companies to persons not in the Government service.

Mr. Speaker, for the above reasons, I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD immediately following the remarks just made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave given me to extend my remarks on the bill, H. R. 1819, to which objection has just been made, and referring to the statement contained in the minority report of Representative RAMSPECK to the effect that employees within the United States receive only $30 for each year of service while the Canal employees receive $37.50, it should be said that while this statement is true yet Canal employees have a 5-percent deduction from their pay while employees within the United States have only 31/2 percent deducted.

For purposes of comparing Canal Zone retirement with that in the United States, let us take the cases of machinists on the Canal Zone and in a navy yard in the United States since the same proportion will hold true in all employments.

Zone machinists' deduction 5 percent. They pay $141.54 annually and receive $1,500 retirement annually.

United States navy yard machinists' deduction 31/2 percent.

They pay $76.88 annually and receive $1,200 retirement annually.

Therefore, if retirement payments were made in proportion to amounts paid into the retirement fund, the Canal Zone man would receive $2,209.30 annually and the navy-yard man $1,200.

Canal Zone employees are making no complaint, however, regarding the above comparison but do feel that they should be permitted to retire at an age earlier than employees in continental United States after long service in the Tropics. away from home, relatives, and friends, under onerous, enervating, monotonous conditions all of which take their toll.

An additional and very pertinent fact is that employees from the Canal Zone have lived, on an average, but 2 years and 8 months after retirement which is far short of life expectancy of similar employees in the United States.

That provision in the bill which permits a surviving beneficiary of an employee to pay up to $10,000 into the Canal Zone retirement fund to purchase additional annuity is approved by the Canal and Panama Railroad officials and the Secretary of War.

The Secretary states such payments would tend to "encourage thrift and would entail no additional expense on the Government."

In this connection it is pointed out that the bill provides, in case such a sum is paid into the retirement fund, that in case of the death of the annuitant no part of the fund shall be returned which is valid proof that there is no intent to saddle the Government with large sums upon which it would be obliged to pay interest.

It is further pointed out that if such an amount may be deposited, it will probably protect a surviving beneficiary from the wiles of vendors of worthless lands or worthless

Government officials, including the Secretary of War, state this bill will not entail additional cost to the Government except for administration and in this connection it is a known fact that the administration referred to will be absorbed by the present force so that additional employees will not be necessary.

The bill should pass as reported by the committee without amendments.

ADDITION OF TRACT OF LAND TO THE SHENANDOAH NATIONAL PARK, VA.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 509, to add certain lands of the Front Royal Quartermaster Depot Military Reservation, Va., to the Shenandoah National Park, and for other purposes. There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands of the Front Royal Quartermaster Depot Military Reservation, Va., are hereby made a part of the Shenandoah National Park, subject to all hereby made a part of the Shenandoan National Park, subject to all laws and regulations applicable thereto: Beginning at concrete monument numbered 10 in the boundary line of the Front Royal Remount Depot, and running thence along said boundary line, north 70 degrees 00 minutes west 3,465.0 feet to monument numbered 11, thence north 40 degrees 30 minutes west 1,881.0 feet to monument numbered 12, thence north 2 degrees 00 minutes west 792.0 feet to monument numbered 13, thence north 78 degrees 00 minutes west 693.0 feet to monument numbered 14, thence south 1 degree 30 minutes west 379.5 feet to monument numbered 15. Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the statement I made before the committee in reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Fernandez]?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill would designate certain lands located in Chalmette, La., as the Chalmette National Historical Park. This area includes the land on which the National Historical Park. This area includes the land on which the Chalmette National Monument is located and which was erected by congressional authorization 1907 to the memory of the soldiers who fell during the Battle of New Orleans in the War of 1812. This area also includes the national cemetery at Chalmette, La., which is now under jurisdiction of the War Department.

As pointed out by the Secretary of the Interior in his letter to your committee April 6, 1939, the administrative jurisdiction and control of the land wherean the monument was excepted were transferred.

of the land whereon the monument was erected were transferred from War Department to the Interior Department by Executive orders of June 10 and July 28, 1933.

The Legislature of Louisiana during the session of 1938 enacted a law (act 163) to authorize and direct the State Parks Commission of Louisiana—

(a) To purchase lands forming part of the battlefield site of the Battle of New Orleans and on which line of defenses of Gen. Andrew Jackson on St. Bernard Parish were located for the defense of New Orleans in January 1815, and such adjacent area as may be needed for the purpose of establishing a national military park to commemorate the victory of the Battle of New Orleans.

(b) To meet the requirements of the National Park Service of the United States Department of the National Park

United States Department of the Interior; and
(c) To transfer such lands to said National Park Service to make an appropriation to carry out the purposes of this act and to repeal all laws or parts of law in conflict herewith.

The legislature appropriated $300,000 to the State Parks Commission of Louisiana for the purpose of carrying out provisions of the act and authorized the State auditor to issue warrant therefor, and authorized the auditor to honor said warrants so issued for the purchase price of lands.

The act also provided that for the purpose of arriving at a fair price for the land to be purchased an appraisal committee was created comprising the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Members of the State Parks Commission, and a greater price shall not be paid than the findings and appraisals of a majority of the said members of the indings and appraisals of a majority of the said memoers of the appraisal committee.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that this legislation was designed to meet the views expressed by President Rocsevelt when he vetoed my bill 2 years ago, and I am happy to note that Mr. Secretary Ickes heartily approves this bill. This is gratifying to the indomitable and persistent advocates of a national memorial on the plains of Chalmette.

Chalmette.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the second last paragraph of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, whereby he recommends amendment that the park be limited to 500 acres instead of 1,000 acres.

NAVAL COMMISSARY PRIVILEGES

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, with respect to Calendar No. 211, the bill S. 499, which the House has just passed by unanimous consent, I have noticed that the title of the bill has reference only to the civilian officers and employees of the United States at naval stations whereas the body of the bill includes officers of the Foreign Service of the United States. In the opinion of the Chair, is it necessary to amend the title to include officers of the Foreign Service?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair may state to the gentleman that is not within the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. May I say to the gentleman that, of course, there is no objection to doing so, but it is not necessary that the title be changed because the title is broad enough to include what the body of the bill authorizes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There may be some question about it in the mind of the Comptroller General or some other officer having to do with the operation of this bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I do not believe there will be any question in the mind of the Comptroller General about it because this bill was prepared by the office of the Judge Advocate General and, of course, they prepared it in a form they considered technically and legally correct. I am perfectly satisfied with it, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the gentleman is satisfied with it, it is satisfactory to me.

COLLECTIONS FOR OVERTIME IMMIGRATION SERVICES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5403, to provide for the deposit of certain collections for overtime immigration services to the credit of the appropriation chargeable with the payment for such services, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I see that this bill has been reported out by the distinguished member of the committee, Mr. Mason. No doubt he has a reason for the faith that is within him and can explain the bill.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I may say in explanation of the bill that it has been approved by the Director of the Budget, Mr. Bell, and was recommended by the Secretary of Labor, and seeks to make the handling of funds collected for overtime employment in the Immigration Service uniform with the handling of similar funds in the Bureau of Customs. This is simply a means of conveying the funds into the Treasury and earmarking them for the particular purpose for which they were collected.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. My principal interest in the matter is that I am the author of the bill that established the financial set-up for the Immigration Service, and I was wondering whether the bill had anything to do with changing the time of the stay of any immigrants?

Mr. MASON. No; this has nothing to do with anything but the deposit of certain collections for overtime immigration services, for which the commander of the vessel must pay, in the Treasury and earmarking them, as has been done when similar collections were made for the Bureau of Customs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as

AMENDMENT TO WAGE-HOUR ACT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I intend to prefer a unanimous-consent request, and I want everyone to understand it. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes after the gentleman from Texas has

The SPEAKER. The Chair can put only one request at a time.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and wish to make a reservation claiming the right to make one observation about the statement the gentleman from Texas expects to make.

Mr. RAYBURN. I shall yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Now?

Mr. RAYBURN. I should like, first, to proceed and let the gentleman know what my request is to be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that he proceed for 2 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in a few minutes the chairman of the Committee on Labor will move to suspend the rules and pass a bill amending the Fair Labor Standards Act, with an amendment, and I think it only fair to the House, inasmuch as that amendment was agreed on only this morning, that the House, before it is voted on as to whether or not we shall proceed with the bill, should know what the amendment is. The criticism was made in the newspapers this morning that this bill in its present form takes away some of the exemptions that so-called farm people enjoy under the act. The amendment that will be proposed has been carefully drawn and states specifically that any and all exemptions now in the act are preserved, notwithstanding the passage of the bill that will be proposed.

I yield to the gentleman from Georgia. Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the amendment that will be offered. It is purely negative in form and amounts to nothing. It is a decoy purely and ought to fool no Member of this House.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, of course, I do not agree that the Committee on Labor would put this out as a decoy only.

Mr. COX. That is what it is, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAYBURN. This amendment is offered to meet an objection that was made to this bill by the so-called farm

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the proposed amendment and I find that it does contain some of the provisions to which the gentleman has referred with reference to exemptions but it binds all of agriculture to the rules and regulations now already laid down by the Administrator, which they are trying to get rid of in the area-of-production provisions of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have asked for this time, Mr. Speaker, so that I might make a statement in order that people would understand what is coming up. If this bill is debated, if consideration of it is not voted down, then these matters can be in the property.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Keller, to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported there wereayes 133 and noes 114.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Kel-LER] is recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand the vote that has just been taken and it would still be more difficult if I believed everyone here had understood what they were voting on.

This is a bill that permits the President of the United States to give 12 acres of ground, more or less, from his estate at Hyde Park, N. Y., which when surveyed shows about 19 acres instead of 12; the donation of a building, to be built by subscription, without expense to the Government; the donation by the President of all of his private papers, gifts of one kind or another, as stipulated in the resolution, without any expense to this country at all.

The maintenance of the library is to be carried on by a very small admission fee. It will not be any expense to the country except for one thing, and I want to make this clear to you. There is one thing that we will have to bear the expense of, and that is the cataloging of between seven and eight million papers and documents. In other words, when we originally formed a plan for and built our Archives, there should have been some provision made at that time to take over the papers of the Presidents of the United States. If that had been done we would have had a better understanding of the size of the building to be built. If that had been done from the beginning of our Government we would not be buying back some of the papers that have become historically exceedingly valuable during the years.

This offer of President Roosevelt to give the people all his official documents, maps, letters, both public and private, is the first instance in which all of the papers of a President of the United States, during his entire incumbency in office, have been offered to the Government as a gift. It ought always to have been so, because if it had been recognized as the duty of the President of the United States to turn over his papers as public property, which they really are, we would have been afforded an invaluable record, one which would have made a complete and entire record of our governmental action from the beginning to the present time. To secure and keep inviolate all documents is the entire idea of having archives at all.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; I yield. Mr. MAPES. The gentleman expressed some surprise at the vote and said he thought it was based upon lack of information in regard to the legislation. Let me ask the gentleman whether the Committee on the Library held any hearings on this bill so that Members could obtain any information in regard to it.

Mr. KELLER. Oh, yes, we did; and we printed a report,

No. 612.

Mr. MAPES. Were the hearings printed?

Mr. KELLER. Not the hearings, but a report was printed. The hearings are available. We have not deemed it necessary to print the hearings, for the report gives the whole thing and the report is done intelligently and done well.

Mr. MAPES. My understanding was that there were no hearings before the Committee on the Library on this bill.

Mr. KELLER. Yes; hearings were held.

Mr. MAPES. But not printed.

Mr. KELLER. The hearings were not printed.

To continue, let me point out that this land is given as a gift, with a right-of-way down to the railroad and down to the river and is under a management that will never bother the United States at all. This library will be a great source for research, covering a tremendously important historic period, and is a gift that we would be foolish not to accept. If we fail to accept this gift, we shall find ourselves in the hereafter paying large prices for some of these records. Had Mr. Hoover and Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Harding given their papers this way, it would have made an invaluable record for historical research in the hereafter. It is a matter of hope that, following Mr. Roosevelt's lead, in the hereafter all Presidents will see the necessity and duty of following this course of action and contribute their papers to the people of this country.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is it not a matter of historical fact that the widows of some of our Presidents in the past, finding themselves impoverished, have sold the Presidential papers to the Government through Congress for thousands of dollars? The President has offered everything at his disposal to the people of the United States.

Mr. KELLER. That is quite true. I may add in this connection that many of the papers of Abraham Lincoln were destroyed outright by men who did not know anything about what they were doing. Their existence today would be invaluable in helping us to understand the problems of his administration.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman made the statement that it was in the interest of the Nation to have the papers of all the Presidents in The Archives.

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Then, only the economic royalists would be able to take advantage of those papers, because there would be archives scattered all over the country, some in New York, some in Texas, some in Ohio, some in California. Why not provide for their keeping in The Archives Building in the Nation's Capital? Why not keep them all here?

Mr. KELLER. All right; that is a fair question. One reason they are not placed in The Archives here is because this building was built so small that it is not in a position to take these papers.

We are planning at the present time, as you know, or as many of you know at least, a very greatly extended building just for the storage of papers which the present Archives Building is not sufficient to accommodate.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a

Mr. KELLER. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOTT. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated a moment ago that if this bill were passed it would not cost the Government any money?

Mr. KELLER. That is right, outside of the cataloging of the papers.

Mr. MOTT. I call the gentleman's attention to section 204, on page 4, of the bill and ask him if the provisions of that section bear out his statement.

Mr. KELLER. I am talking by the book. I know what I am saying. To what page did the gentleman refer?

Mr. MOTT. Page 4, section 204. I will read it to the gentleman:

SEC. 204. The faith of the United States is pledged that, upon the construction of the Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and the acquisition from the donor of the collection of historical material in accordance with the terms of this title, the United States will provide such funds as may be necessary for the upkeep of the said library and the administrative expenses and costs of operation thereof, including the preservation and care of historical material acquired under this title, so that the said library shall be at all times properly maintained.

Mr. KELLER. When that question came up, my office called the President's office. The President authorized me to say that a careful estimate had been made of the necessary cost for that and that it would be provided for, as I said before, by a small admission fee at the library itself. Therefore there will be no costs, administrative, operative, or otherwise. There is, however, always the necessity of guarding against unforeseeable contingencies.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield? Who is the father of this bill?

Mr. KELLER. I am, and proud of it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to speak on this measure. I realize I will be accused of being partisan and ungracious toward what might be regarded as a worth-while donation from the President of the United States. However, as a member of the Library Committee, I feel compelled to take the floor just briefly.

On April 20 the Senate passed Joint Resolution 118 by unanimous consent, page 4543 of the Congressional Record, No report of the Library Committee was ever made to the Senate. Not a word was spoken on the floor of the Senate about the bill.

The first I knew about it was 2 or 3 weeks ago, when, in a committee meeting, the chairman showed the late Representative Lord and myself some papers and stated it was a report from the Senate on this bill. He asked for its confirmation. We both told him we were opposed to it. He said the committee had already accepted it. My memory may not be long, but it is long enough to remember that there never was any meeting, so far as I know, of the Library Committee to take up this question.

We told him further we were opposed to the measure, and the next thing I knew it was here on the floor last week, having appeared at that time on the Consent Calendar. Those are the circumstances in connection with the reporting of this bill. If it is such a meritorious measure why has it been sealed up in the Library Committee?

Mr. Speaker, may I add one word further? The gentleman stated there was a hearing on the bill and that the hearing file is available. I have asked for it and I have never been able to obtain it, nor have I ever seen it. It is not in print. There is no evidence whatever that the terms of the bill will be carried out. For instance, the gentleman from Illinois was asked a moment ago, in reference to the upkeep of the building. He says we could get all the information in the report. Let me call attention to section 4 of the report, page 2, whereby the United States agrees to pay in the future such funds as may be necessary for the upkeep of said library. Yet he says there will be no expense because there will be an admission charge to go into a building 5 miles up the Hudson River from Poughkeepsie. This is certainly not a proper or suitable place to establish a branch Archives Building.

We have an Archives Building in this city that cost the Government $12,000,000. If the President of the United States or any other noted citizen wants to make a contribution to the archives, why should not those documents be put either in the Congressional Library or in the United States Archives Building which was built for that purpose? [Applause,]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield for two brief questions?

Mr. TREADWAY. Very briefly.

Mr. SHORT. On page 2, section 202, the Archivist is authorized to construct a building or buildings. The number of buildings to be constructed is not stated to the Members of the House, nor is there any estimate given as to what the total cost will be.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is not only no estimate of the total cost, there is no recognition of where we are going to get the money. There is no recognition of what it is going to cost to keep up the building when it is completed and built on an isolated road that very shortly will be almost abandoned. The Albany Post Road will be out of the picture shortly except for trucks and local traffic.

Mr. SHORT. That alone is sufficient reason for defeating this measure. I want also to call the attention of the membership of the House to section 304, on page 10, at the conclusion of the bill, where it is stated:

The right is reserved in the Congress to take such action and to The right is reserved in the Congress to take such action and to make such changes, modifications, alterations, and improvements in connection with and upon any property acquired under this title, during or after the expiration of any life estate reserved therein, as the Congress shall deem proper and necessary to protect and preserve the same; but neither the improvements so made nor any increase in the value of the property by reason thereof shall be subject to tayetion during the avistence of sam life estate reserved. subject to taxation during the existence of any life estate reserved in the property.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 additional minute, but I would like to use part of it.

Mr. SHORT. Briefly stated, section 304 provides that the donor shall give this library or part of the estate to the United States Government, providing the United States Government gives back to the donor a life estate in it, and he is not to be taxed upon any improvements that are made. In other words, the United States Government will have to pay the taxes and pay for the upkeep of this library as long as there is any

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, this whole proposition is contrary to the established policy of this country relating to Federal monuments to living men. I hope that precedent will be continued.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wis-

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will not the Roosevelt national debt be a perpetual and everlasting monument to our New Deal President?

Mr. TREADWAY. That monument will certainly be a sufficient burden to unborn generations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to the belief that my constituents would be in favor of this proposed Franklin D. Roosevelt Library in my congressional district to be donated by private subscriptions and maintained by the Government. I want to go on record, however, as opposed to the proposition, not on partisan grounds but because I believe it would be a very serious matter for the Congress of the United States to place its stamp of approval upon this legislation and set up a precedent under which in the future all the papers of the various Presidents would be scattered around the country. It is almost the unwritten law, it has become the tradition of our country, that the public documents, the letters and private and public papers of the Chief Executives of the Nation, whether the Presidents be Republicans or Democrats, shall be housed in the Congressional Library. Practically all these papers from the very beginning of our country, from Washington's administration down, are now housed in the Congressional Library, with very few exceptions, including the two Adamses and Hayes. In no case has the Congress of the United States by its consent or its approval offered any encouragement or certified that these papers which historically belong to the people and ought to be in the Congressional Library should be scattered around the country, whether it be in my congressional district, where I would like to see a public building as a gift, or in someone else's congressional district.

The students and the historians who go to the source material have a right to be able to reach this source material as they have in the past in the Library of Congress in order to write American history, and not be forced to wander around through the different congressional districts of the United States.

I say to you this is not a partisan matter; it is an American issue. It is a question of principle and upholding and maintaining the traditions of our country. If we by this bill encourage any change in this tradition, we are rendering a disservice to our country and to the future historians of our Nation.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Does the gentleman know that the Huntington Library in Los Angeles is visited by scholars from all over the world, and that this proposed library would probably also be a Mecca for scholars?

Mr. FISH. The Huntington Library, which I have visited, is a very large and fine library, but there are no Presidential papers there of consequence. I have just stated to the House, and I state again, that this is not a partisan matter, because I believe you Democrats are just as good Americans as the Republicans. [Applause.] This is an American issue. If you are going to vote on partisanship alone and say you do not care, that you are Democrats and that is all there is to it, and that Franklin Roosevelt is a Democratic President, then you are helping to create an unfortunate precedent by approving this exception to the practice of virtually every American President down to this day.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman consider it a partisan act on the part of the Democratic side of the House when we voted to accept the Mellon Art Gallery and gave our consent unanimously?

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. Mr. Mellon put up all the money. Those objects of art and paintings do not belong and never did belong to the Government. They have nothing to do with the Government, and came as a gift from Mr. Mellon, a patron and benefactor of art, to the American people and were accepted by Congress.

Mr. SIROVICH. Who maintains them?

Mr. FISH. We were very glad to get them, but they have nothing to do with the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. SIROVICH. Who maintains them?

Mr. FISH. We were very glad to have them right here in Washington, and I assume the Congress will appropriate sufficient funds to maintain them.

Mr. SIROVICH. Who owns the land?

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Furthermore, the National Gallery of Art does not bear Mr. Mellon's name nor is it located upon his own estate that shall not be subject to taxation as long as any of his kith or kin maintain a life interest in it.

Mr. SIROVICH. But the Government of the United States gave the land and maintains the gallery, spending $100,000 every year to maintain it.

Mr. FISH. The gift of famous paintings by Mr. Mellon was purely a personal matter. The papers of President Roosevelt rightly belong in the Congressional Library with the papers of other Presidents and open to the public free of charge. I hope this will not be a partisan issue. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Bolles].

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of erecting an apotheosis to a living man, whether it be on the Hudson River or on the Potomac. We built here in the city of Washington a great hall of archives. Over the long years since I came to Washington as a newspaperman we have been discussing from time to time the preservation of these archives, these things that came down to us and became a part of the patriotic history of the United States. If there is any location in the world where these papers ought to be collected, not in museums nor in private institutions erected to the memory of a living President or anyone else, it is here in this Capital of the United States, to which from time to time all the people of this country come. [Applause.] This is the center and the attraction.

I said long years ago when I was a member of the McKinley National Memorial Association that the erection of a great monument to McKinley in the city of Canton, Ohio, was an error; that it should be erected in the Capital of the United States, where he served, and from which he went forth to die by the hand of an assassin. I say to you that a monument here would have been better. There is no place for these archives, no place for these great papers, however great they may be-I do not discuss that-except in the city of Washington, D. C., where they can be preserved forever. All our famous documents-the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, all those things we hold most dear-are over here in the Congressional Library, and they should remain here. [Applause.]

We have an old tradition in these United States that memorials and shrines erected as pilgrimage places shall not come until the historical character has passed from the living scene. While this hall of archives or historical place on the bank of the Hudson may be indicated as a place for the preservation of the documents of the executive department and personally by the President over the period of the term of his service, it in reality will be taken by the public as a monument to him during his life. I object to that, Mr. Speaker, not because the President is who he is, but because of this tradition. We do not even engrave the faces of living people on postage stamps. We have here in Washington a place for these documents and all of the great documents of the Presidents of the United States with the exception of a very few-the Adamses and President Hayes. They are preserved here among us. The papers of President Hayes were given to a small library and museum erected by himself, in his hometown, at his own expense and provided by the expense of his family for preservation, and he did not call upon nor have his heirs ask the Congress of the United States to make any appropriation, no matter how small, for its preservation.

I am impressed with the desire of the President that these documents of his, which in many ways are his personal property, may be kept intact, and it also can be done. If he so desires to do this, let him as a memorial both to himself and for the information of posterity erect this building, fit it out and present it to the United States.

Even then, Mr. Speaker, I believe the proper place for such documents over so peculiarly interesting a period of our history, should be kept in the Congressional Library or the Hall of Archives. I am willing to vote for that amount of an appropriation which would preserve these documents here in Washington but not to give them sepulture on the banks of the Hudson.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill was on the Consent Calendar, and we made its consideration, under suspension of the rules, possible because we are seriously opposed to the bill. I am seriously opposed to the bill for several reasons, and I hope no one will charge me with opposing it on partisanship grounds.

I think, undoubtedly, there are in Mr. Roosevelt's files a great many very important state papers which might be valuable to posterity. I think those papers should be put with the other great state papers of all the other Presidents of the United States here in the Library of Congress and in The Archives Building.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would like to follow through with this statement, and then, if I have time, I will be pleased to yield.

There is no estimate of the cost of maintenance. The Archivist is authorized to appoint clerks, officers, and employees. Surely, the place must be policed and there must be janitors and there will be other expense.

Perhaps the question which transcends all others in this bill is that there are certain provisions which are objectionable because they are unconstitutional. Payments will be made by the Treasury out of a fund created by the charging of admissions. Under this bill the same unconstitutional provision is found as was called to the attention of the House within the last week in connection with another most important bill in which a special fund was created and by which we sought to authorize the Treasury of the United States to make payments without specific appropriations by Congress. The Constitution specifically provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except as a consequence of appropriations made by law, and the provision in this bill which would seek to establish a separate fund where these collections should be placed and authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to recognize requisitions by the Archivist or whatever authority is set up here to administer this, is clearly not within the Constitution.

This is supposed to be, or the inference is held out that this is, a branch of The Archives here in Washington. Let me call attention to the fact that no admission is charged to The Archives Building; nothing is charged for admission to the Congressional Library, where, surely, state papers of equal importance are housed; no fee is paid to see the great papers that have been called to your attention here, such as the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence. One of the most interesting exhibits in the Congressional Library is the genesis of the Declaration of Independence itself in the handwriting of Thomas Jefferson. We do not have to pay anything to go over to the Library or down to The Archives and see those great documents in the handwriting of those great men. Now, why should we have to charge 25 cents, after paying transportation to Hyde Park, to see the papers which have come into existence during the last few years.

This is not in keeping with our policy, and it is not constitutional. It is establishing a precedent which is going to harass us very much in the future. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I am sure I would be the last person in the House to object to opposition on the part of the people on the other side of the aisle to a measure that had substance to it with which they did not agree; but it seems to me that opposition to this measure is carrying the matter of opposing the President of the United States to a rather ridiculous extreme.

Here is a case where it is proposed that his privately collected papers, collected at great personal expense over a long period of time, shall be made available to the people of the United States. Here is a proposition where there is to be created a place where these papers can all be available for all time to come, and I find it very difficult to understand why partisan politics should be carried to such an extreme as to oppose this. It seems to me, on the contrary, that there are times when such partisan matters should be overlooked and when the House, in the consideration of a generous gesture, ought itself to act generously in connection with it.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman see anything partisan in the contention that great state papers of this kind ought to be housed in the Congressional Library or in The Archives Building, instead of on the Hyde Park estate? What does the gentleman see partisan about that?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. It seems to me the proposition that is before us is a very good proposition, that these papers are of a sort that go together very well, that they are along certain particular lines, and that one has to rather look for a chance to be against it. That is all I mean.

Mr. MOTT. Why not move the Jefferson Library now housed in the Congressional Library down to Monticello?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I do not know that I would object to that; that may be a good idea. All I am saying is, it appears to me that this is a generous act on the part of the President of the United States and it seems to me it should be received in like fashion by the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. All right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. We are all aware of the fact that there will be hundreds of thousands of school children that will never get to Hyde Park or any other outlying place, and does not the gentleman think that it would be better to have these papers down here for those children to see?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. No; I am not at all sure it would be better. In any case when a man is making an outright gift I believe he should have something to say about where it is to be placed. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, as a student of history, I have observed that certain keymen in the several critical periods of our history have exerted a great influence, which influence has not been discovered for 50 or 100 years afterward. George Washington was such a man, Abraham Lincoln was such a man, and Franklin D. Roosevelt is such a man. I am convinced that many years from now the students of American history will turn back to see what influences were at work. I wish to accept the President's offer of his estate and his private papers for the Nation during these years. I propose now by my vote to lay all cards on the table so that we may be able to see what forces were at work in this very critical period of the Nation's history.

Students of history have often remarked on the difficulty of assessing properly the part played by a great man in the history of his country and of the world while he yet lives. Historians cannot write adequately of their own times. Thucydides is perhaps the only famous historian who could write without bias and with proper appreciation of the momentous period through which he lived. The reason that no person can analyze and understand his own times is because of his lack of perspective. To attempt to do so is like trying to read a huge billboard by walking close to it and under it. For that reason no man's niche in history can be properly marked until years after his death.

Although we must wait, it seems, until after a man has been dead 50 or a hundred years to assess him properly and his influence upon the development of his country, the work of the historian is usually difficult at so late a date because of lack of material, personal facts, and documentary evidence which meanwhile have become scattered and much of it lost. How difficult it has been for a loving country to round up the precious belongings of George Washington after his estate and personal belongings had passed to other hands. How very valuable the personal papers of James Madison, properly known as the Father of the Constitution, became to his countrymen after his death, and how very fortunate it was that it was possible to acquire from his widow the notes on the great convention of 1787. These were of incalculable value and, if scattered or destroyed, could never have been duplicated. The world would have been the loser.

I was told a story recently by a descendant of a friend of Abraham Lincoln that a small boy, with an admirable motive to help his mother in straightened circumstances, clipped the name of Abraham Lincoln from 13 of Lincoln's original letters and sold the signatures for 10 cents each, thus providing his mother, as he supposed, a vitally needed sum of $1.30. Of course, the child did not know what he was really doing. Therefore, I favor this bill, not mildly, but with intense enthusiasm, that we may accept as a gift for the Nation important papers and materials of Franklin D. Rocsevelt which later historians will undoubtedly find of inestimable value.

Why do I think this is likely to be the case? It is because I believe that today is one of the critical periods of American history. This truly is one of those "times that try men's souls." America has had numerous such critical times. The brief period that marked the birth of American independence was such a time. The half dozen years during which the Constitution was in the making was such a critical period. Those years of which Harriet Beecher Stowe sang in The Battle Hymn of the Republic was such a time. Likewise the period beginning on March 4, 1933, is such a time.

The doctrines of American liberty and equality have been of slow growth. Thomas Jefferson drew the blue prints for them in the Declaration of Independence. Washington, Madison, and Hamilton helped to materialize them in the Constitution of the United States. Jefferson, later as President, helped to bring about political democracy, based on liberty and equality, with the turn of the century 14 decades ago. Andrew Jackson elevated the common man and contributed his part toward social democracy about a century ago; Abraham Lincoln wrested power from a landed aristocracy and brought freedom to the enslaved in the name of a broader liberty and equality. Unless I am greatly mistaken, Franklin D. Roosevelt will, in the proper lapse of time, take his place along with these immortals as a great exponent of industrial democracy looking toward a new phase of liberty and equality.

No wonder Franklin D. Roosevelt fondly harks back to Andrew Jackson. The battle which these two men have fought is the same, differing only slightly in phases. Andrew Jackson was the champion of the common man, and Franklin D. Roosevelt is today the champion of the common man. Just as Andrew Jackson sought to bring about political and social equality, so does this Roosevelt, pushing beyond the other Roosevelt, seek now to bring about social and political equality, adding to it industrial, economic equality. We are too close to this beginning trend to understand it fully.

The present occupant of the White House is as great a humanitarian as was Lincoln, with this difference: 'That Roosevelt's sympathies extend to all the underprivileged or the oppressed and are not centered or emphasized by race or color. On the whole, America had a glorious half century of history prior to March 1933, characterized by an era of business. There is much in that half century of which we may justly be proud. However, many of the rights of man were lightly held and scarcely considered by the economic overlords who controlled our Government, dictated our laws, and operated our economic system. With the beginning of the New Deal, a new era was struggling to be born. No one can yet see what is being born, but of this we may be sure: America will never be the same again as before 1929.

Whatever the future holds for our country, Franklin D. Roosevelt will loom larger and larger with every passing year as a shaper of that destiny which is to be ours. Surely we will want to know everything that man thought and wrote and said, and for that reason we must preserve every bit of his history-making life. This is my reason for casting a vote for this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, for 16 years I had the honor of being a member of the Committee on the Library. In all that time I do not recall a partisan question being raised. Surely the gentleman from California [Mr. Voorhis] cannot point his finger to me as taking the floor in this matter by reason of any partisan influence or for any partisan purpose. In the course of time that I was chairman of the Committee on the Library, I was saved from what threatened to be a most embarrassing situation, brought about by the proposal to erect a memorial to Theodore Roosevelt at the south end of the axis of which the White House is at the north, near the site now to be occupied by the Jefferson Memorial. Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Theodore Roosevelt at that time being dead, disapproved the proposal upon the ground that not enough time had elapsed since the death of her husband for a proper estimate to be made of the place he was to occupy in history. Mark you, I was a Republican, confronted by the proposal to honor a man who in his day was as equally beloved and equally disliked as the present President of the United States. Had I been compelled to face that situation, if I kept up with the tradition of the committee, it would have been necessary for me to vote against that proposal, as it seems to me that Democrats today, regardless of the fact that they are Democrats, might well vote against this proposal. There is no partisanship in the idea that the papers of Presidents of the Nation should be kept in their proper surroundings, that they should be housed in the Library of Congress, the great building to which we have recently added one still more spacious, with room enough for the books and papers, with opportunity for their proper handling and exhibition. Mind you, that Library began because Thomas Jefferson gave his library to the Nation. He might well have had in mind the fact that these documents are chiefly of interest and importance to students of history. They should be made readily accessible to students of history.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I have only a few minutes. I regret I cannot yield. To place them in a remote spot, difficult of access, not frequently visited by the public, would prove a great inconvenience for students and an injury to the value of the collection itself. It would be in every way a bad precedent to establish while the man in whose honor it is created is living, and it would be unfortunate to establish it where it cannot be of use to students and where it would in the course of the years be almost forgotten. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, after that generous reception from those on my left, I regret very much to be compelled to say some things that I feel ought to be said. I must refer particularly to my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce] and my very good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], longer in friendship than Mr. Luce, because we came into the House together. I am sorry they said there is no partisanship in this. One gentleman on the Republican side said something about selling memoirs. I was a Member of the House when Mr. Coolidge sold his writings at a dollar a word and I was powerful glad he could. I read them with a great deal of interest. I was a Member of Congress during the Harding administration when charges and countercharges were flying all around the Capitol and throughout the Nation, but during none of that time did I ever utter a word that would reflect upon the personal character of the President of the United States or upon the personal character of a man who had been President of the United States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Luce] endeavored to compare this proposal with the proposal to which he referred in connection with Theodore Roosevelt. That was to build a memorial in the city of Washington to Theodore Roosevelt. This is to accept a donation of land at Hyde Park and the whole estate, as I understand it, is to pass to this foundation and all of the buildings erected there will be erected not by Federal funds but by contributions of the people who like Mr. Roosevelt.

These are not public papers. They are the private property of Franklin D. Roosevelt, as papers of this sort have been the private property of every President of the United States. He could sell them, of course, for a fancy sum. They would be scattered to the four winds and no student who visited any one part of the United States would ever have an opportunity to see them.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] said the Senate unanimously passed this bill. Nobody expected, when this proposal was made, that it would not pass the House of Representatives unanimously either. [Applause.]

I am sorry. I like you gentlemen. Many of you are friends of a quarter of a century. I really think, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], that this is a sorry spectacle; that is, in my opinion. If this offer had been made by Mr. Harding, Mr. Coolidge, or Mr. Hoover, no one would have heard my voice raised. I would have accepted it. They are being offered by a man generous enough to place them at the disposal of the American people, when he could have sold them for thousands upon thousands of dollars, let me repeat. Just because he happens to be Franklin D. Roosevelt that some of you do not like, especially his own Congressman from his own district, I do not believe if I were you gentlemen I would follow them off. I would act, as a Republican, like I would have acted had this been presented during a Republican administration. I would accept this generous offer. I would not let my partisanship go so far in a matter like this.

Franklin D. Roosevelt will be perpetuated in name whether these buildings are erected or not. It matters not whether you love his policies or hate them; it matters not whether you love Mr. Roosevelt or hate him; I dislike very much to hear this roll call and see you gentlemen on that side of the aisle do the thing that I fear you are going to do. It just does not come up quite to what I felt I could expect of you. I hope you do not do it. There is time enough left when the roll is called or when it is not, for you to do what I believe and what I especially hope you will do on this occasion. [Applause and laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the resolution passed.

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 161 and noes 131.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 229, nays 139, not voting 62, as follows:

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 5474) to amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, approved June 25, 1938, with committee amendments.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to permit me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this bill will not be contested.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the bill, H. R. 5475, which was introduced by me and is now before the House for consideration, proposes a number of amendments to the railroad unemployment insurance law passed in 1938. The amendments were suggested by the Railroad Retirement Board, which is the agency required by law to administer the railroad unemployment insurance law. Practically all of the proposed amendments are for the purpose of making formal corrections in the text of the unemployment insurance law. Those which are not, strictly speaking, corrections in form are proposed amendments looking to a more efficient administration of the act.

The chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board, Mr. Latimer, appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committe of the House and explained in detail all of the proposed amendments. The bill was approved by the committee without a dissenting vote, and there was practically no objection to any of the proposed amendments, except the one which proposed to remove the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska from the provisions of the railroad unemployment insurance law. The committee struck out that provision of the bill, so that Hawaii and Alaska continue exactly as was provided under the terms of the railroad unemployment insurance law passed in 1938.

I wish to say to the Members of the House that, in my opinion, all of the amendments proposed are highly desirable and will make for a more satisfactory administration of the law. I trust that the bill now before the House, H. R. 5475, may be passed by the unanimous vote of the House.

I now ask for a vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire any time?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, all I desire to say is that this bill comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with unanimous report. The amendments have been recommended by the Railroad Employment Board. The gentleman from Ohio has explained them. As far as I know, there are no requests for time on this side.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Have the legislative representatives of the recognized railroad labor organizations indicated their approval of this bill before your committee?

Mr. MAPES. My understanding is they have, although I have no recollection of their appearance before the committee. My recollection is, however, that the chairman of the board said that they approved these amendments. ask the gentleman from Ohio, Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. CROSSER. That is right.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from New York. Mr. FISH. I would like to find out definitely what the Big Four Brotherhoods have recommended.

Mr. CROSSER. They are for this bill.

Mr. FISH. Did they appear before the committee?

Mr. CROSSER. No. Mr. Latimer said he had talked with them, and they were all satisfied.

Mr. FISH. I think they are one of the most conservative, intelligent, loyal, and dependable labor groups in America.

Mr. CROSSER. The fact of the matter is they approved it—the short-line railroads and the others all approved it.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows of no opposition from the Big Four Brotherhoods and the other railroad employee organizations?

Mr. CROSSER. I do not know of any opposition from anywhere to this bill.

Mr. FISH. I think it should be unanimously passed, then, as it has the approval of the railroad employees, who deserve and are entitled to these benefits, and of the railroad companies.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Did any opposition to this bill come from any source?

Mr. MAPES. I can only repeat the answer of the gentleman from Ohio. I know of no opposition from any source whatever.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Either railroad brotherhoods or from the railroads themselves?

Mr. MAPES. That is right. These amendments, as I understand it, have been approved by both parties.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It simply helps to effectuate the purposes of Congress in reference to this matter?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on Senate Joint Resolution 118.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Keller]?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. Dempsey]?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a small area in Lincoln County, N. Mex., where they have a large reservoir which supplies water to seven towns. This provides that if you take out a mining permit you must do mining and not raise goats or sheep, which would pollute the waters that come into these towns. That is all this is.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. This bill carries a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. Dempsey]?

THE TOWNSEND BILL

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, last week when the so-called Townsend bill was brought up for a vote in the House I was unavoidably detained on a trip to Iowa on official business. In fairness to the people of my district I think that my position on this controversial question should be made known.

Let me say that although I was opposed by the Townsend national organization in the last election, I have sponsored and supported old-age pension legislation ever since I first became a member of the Iowa State Senate. It follows, therefore, that my sympathies have always been with the old people enlisted in the Townsend movement. Accordingly, I have consistently favored giving this plan a fair hearing and have several times signed petitions and written letters to get the bill out of committee and onto the floor of the House for discussion and debate so that its merits or demerits could be properly assayed and ascertained.

As originally conceived and commonly accepted, up until a few days ago, the Townsend plan was essentially a transactions-tax idea, the success of which depended upon the accelerated velocity of money. At the last minute, however, drastic changes were made by the author and sponsor, so that the bill that came before the House was not the original Townsend bill but an entirely different bill, which, apparently, shifted the burden of financing the plan to the shoulders of the poor people of the country. As I see it, the final version of the bill was a "share the wealth" plan, with most of the sharing to be done by the folks who had little or nothing to share.

Careful analysis shows that the new Townsend bill, in addition to a confusing supersales tax, called for a gross-income tax to be imposed upon every person in the United States receiving more than $50 in any one month. The rate is the same on the income of the W. P. A. worker as on the income of the millionaire—2 percent. I do not believe that the poor people of the Ninth District of Iowa could afford to pay such a tax.

I find, too, that the revised Townsend plan would be extremely burdensome to agriculture. In the case of corn, a tax would be levied on the total wages of farm hands employed in producing the corn; the farmer would pay a tax on the total sales value of the corn or hogs sold to the commission firm; the middleman would pay a tax on the total sales value of the hogs when sold to the packing house; the packing house, in turn, would pay a tax on the total sales value of the processed product, and likewise the wholesaler, then the local jobber, and then the retailer. Each time the product passed through a merchandising or distribution process, another tax would be compounded, until by the time the product reached the consumer the tax would probably exceed the original price received by the farmer. All these cumulative taxes eventually would have to be passed on to the consumer or back to the farmer in lower prices for the corn he produced.

It appears, too, that under this bill great monopolies would be encouraged and built up and that the "little-business man" would be driven out of business because he is not efficient enough and financially able to compete with the trusts. The little-business men of my State are already on the verge of bankruptcy and ruin as a result of the unfair competition of the Wall Street chains and monopolies.

I could go on and enumerate various other classes of citizens that would be penalized or put out of business by this plan, such as real-estate men, State bankers, and stock brokers, but the bill as finally drawn is so full of loopholes and such a monstrosity that time does not permit, nor do I think such a detailed explanation is necessary to the thinking people of my district.

As I see it, purchasing power is not increased by the new bill; it is merely passed around. The W. P. A. worker, the laborer, and the farmer is required to divide up his meager earnings so that everyone over 60 may retire and live in luxury, regardless of the need of that person over 60.

Figures on the cost of operating this plan, as presented at the Ways and Means Committee hearing, show that the cost to the people of Iowa would have been between four hundred and five hundred million dollars a year. Where is this money coming from? As the citizens of Iowa already have great difficulty in meeting the Federal Government's annual assessment of $25,000,000 a year, it is quite evident that the half billion dollar a year burden would have been unbearable.

As my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Patman] has stated, this is not a tax to be paid by the rich or by those who have a net income over and above their expenses. It is to be paid by the poorest people on the barest necessities of life, as well as by the rich on the luxuries and at the same rate, the same tax on bread as on diamonds. In short, this plan means that every man, woman, and child in the United States would have to pay annually an average of a $200 tax on his food, clothing, and other necessities and comforts of life in order to support the program.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the reasons why I could not and would not have voted for this latest version of the Townsend bill had I been present for the roll call on last Thursday.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein a statement by W. C. McClure, of Arkansas, before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend at this point in the Record the remarks I intended to make this afternoon if the bill H. R. 5435 had been brought up under suspension.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I regret that it has been seen fit by administration forces in Congress to bring the Norton bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act before the House for consideration and action under suspension of the rules, and thereby denying to us the privilege of offering amendments to the bill which are vital and necessary and which, I am convinced, are so meritorious that the relief desired would readily be approved.

On May 11, last, I submitted to the House arguments as to the necessity of according relief to wholesaling and distributing establishments, so that they might be permitted to operate under the 44-hour workweek instead of being compelled to reduce their hours to 42 for the coming year and to 40 hours thereafter. For this purpose I introduced the bill H. R. 4631 on March 1, 1939, the text of which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed in an establishment the principal portion of the business of which is wholesaling or distributing, and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of 44 hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed."

Prior to my service in Congress I was for many years engaged in business as a wholesaler and retailer, and believe I have an intimate knowledge of the service which is expected to be rendered by the wholesaling and distributing establishments. In recent years the demands for "service" have steadily increased, due to the economic condition of the retailer and the natural competition for trade.

Since I first brought this matter to the attention of Congress I have been hearing from every section of the country—North, South, East, and West, expressing approval of these efforts for relief, and urging favorable action if such businesses were to be permitted to survive, and render service which cannot be avoided. While every wholesaler and retailer is vitally affected, some of the most appealing representations have been made to me by small wholesalers, many of whom have been in operation for many years, during which period they have consistently taken care of their organization, and today find themselves confronted with a situation they do not know how to handle. Their expenses of business are continually increasing, and their limited profits are fast disappearing.

The main purpose of the Fair Labor Standards Act is to insure greater opportunities for employment, and to raise the standard of employment conditions. So far as the whole-saling and distributing businesses are concerned employment opportunities cannot be increased. To handle such business it is necessary to have a force of trained men—employees who know this business, who are familiar with the requirements of their customers, and the facilities of the concern by whom they are employed. In many such establishments employees are actually engaged in work for a limited number of hours for which they are paid, but must be held available in order to meet a service which is to be expected.

Working conditions among this class of employees have always been good. Generally these employees all receive above the minimum wage, and are paid for sick leave and vacation. One of my correspondents cites the facts they give their employees 2 weeks vacation with pay; seven holidays a year with pay, and one week sick leave with pay, which totals 4 weeks in a year with pay. I find such a condition exists in the entire industry, and that the employees are fully satisfied and pleased with these conditions.

After such liberal consideration has been accorded the employee, what may be expected to happen when workweek hours are reduced to 42 or 40? Surely, it is not to be expected that with the increased cost of doing business that the number of employees will be increased, but it is likely that the concessions to employees in the way of vacations and sick leave will either be eliminated or at least reduced.

In my former presentation of this matter in the House on May 11 I covered the requirements of the wholesaler and distributor more fully, At this time, therefore, I shall only summarize some points which, in my opinion, should be decisive.

First. Wholesalers and distributors are distinctly service institutions.

Second. They must always be ready to meet the requirements of the retailer, which in many cases are for emergencies—particularly in food and drugs.

Third. Their employees should not be subject to the same restrictions as those engaged in manufacturing, and so forth, due to the different character of such business.

Fourth. Practically all retailers (on whom they depend for business) are not subject to the provisions of this act, as they are engaged in intrastate business, and most of them remain open over 50 hours a week.

Fifth. Saturday cannot be eliminated as a workday.

Sixth. Thousands of items carried requires employees with thorough knowledge of use, location, and so forth, of merchandise. Part-time employees impracticable.

Seventh. Overtime payments would make profitable operation a real problem, if not an impossibility.

Eighth. Their labor conditions are on a high plane. Scale of pay has been high. Their employees are satisfied.

Ninth. There has been little fluctuation of employment. Practically all positions are permanent.

Tenth. No labor-saving machinery is involved.

With the conditions under which this bill is being considered here today, it is impossible to offer the provisions of my bill, H. R. 4631, as an amendment. However, before this Norton bill can be finally enacted it must be acted upon by the Senate, and I hope that that body may be convinced with the urgency and need of this relief, and incorporate such a provision in the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise the remarks I made in reply particularly to the question asked by the gentleman from Kentucky relative to the railroad unemployment-insurance bill which has just been passed. The railroad retirement legislation was based on an agreement between the railroad executives and the brotherhoods, and not the insurance legislation. However, the fact that both organizations agree to the bill just passed is

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter addressed to me by Mr. Fahey, of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

EMBARGO ON SALE OF MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS OF WAR TO JAPAN

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include therein brief excerpts from letters received from citizens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, there is tremendous sentiment in this country in behalf of the imposition of an embargo upon the sale of munitions and materials of war to Japan. To that end I introduced a bill in this Congress, H. R. 5432, designed to accomplish the objectives sought by so many citizens of America. The favorable response to this bill has been widespread and most encouraging. Some 200,000 citizens of the Pacific coast alone have signed petitions urging the enactment of such legislation. Whatever justification may be offered in extenuation or defense of aggression by dictator powers in Europe because of the Treaty of Versailles and geographical readjustments, certainly no logical argument can be advanced as a support for the activity of Nippon in subjugating China. The history of the island empire since the Sino-Japanese war of 1894-95 has been one of continuous and wanton aggression. I appreciate that the Japanese people are crowded in congested areas; that only about one-fortieth of the land is tillable; that increases in population are rapid, but no conditions at home can persuade the occidental mind to endorse the bombing of defenseless cities, the assault and rapine, the brutality and excruciating cruelty which have characterized the most recent Japanese aggressions in China. The fall of Nanking filled the world with horror, but the cold-blooded and ruthless war of invasion whereby noble people have had their lands invaded by force has shocked the world. Let us not be a party to this aggression. Let us refuse longer to participate in it. Let us deny to the Japanese arms, equipment, and financial help and thus discourage her aggressions. Without our high-grade oil, automobile equipment, and scrap metal, alone, Japan would be unable to pursue her war beyond a couple of months.

Because I believe that expressions from citizens of all walks of life would be of great interest to the American people, I am including select excerpts from thousands of letters received by me from men and women of all political viewpoints and of every walk of life in the Congressional Record. I append hereto a few examples of such quotations:

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.

It is with great pleasure that I note your resolution for an embargo on war supplies from the United States to Japan.

That, it seems to me, strikes right at the root of the evil. If we can cut out the war profit, many who now are desirous of war would at once lose their interest; and keeping the United States out of war would be an easier proposition.

It has been a source of sorrow and chagrin to us to know that instead of being neutral in this undeclared war of the aggressor nation, Japan, on China, the United States has been actually making possible that war by our shipments of supplies to Japan.

How much longer will we stand by and see aggressor nations, strengthened by our resources, ravish victim nations with whom our public opinion sympathizes? EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I renew a request I made this afternoon to extend my remarks at that point in the RECORD and to include therein a rough draft of a bill drafted by a gentleman by the name of Mr. Altman, also a draft of the bill H. R. 4931, and remarks from the Com-monwealth Congress in New York City.

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object. Mr. Speaker, and I shall object, I believe it would be very unfortunate if we began printing bills in the RECORD. gentleman can extend his remarks and make any kind of an explanation of a bill he may desire, but printing bills in the RECORD is a practice I have never heard of.

Mr. THORKELSON. The reason I wish to put this in the RECORD is that it contains information I think the House ought to know.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman can introduce the bill and make whatever explanations he wishes. I may say to the gentleman it has never been the custom to have bills printed in the RECORD in this manner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. RAYBURN. I object to that part of the request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD as of this date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

VLTO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES-EXPORTATION OF TOBACCO SEED AND PLANTS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval H. R. 2378, entitled "An act to prohibit the exportation of tobacco seed and plants, except for experimental purposes."

This bill declares it to be unlawful to export any tobacco seed and/or live tobacco plants from the United States or any territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof unless such exportation is in pursuance of a written permit granted by the Secretary of Agriculture after proof satisfactory to him that such seeds or plants are to be used for experimental purposes only.

I understand that this measure was adopted without hearings, without debate, and without record vote in either the House of Representatives or in the Senate. There may not, therefore, have come to the attention of the Members of the Congress various considerations which raise doubt as to the practicability of the bill and the wisdom of the policy embodied therein. Some of these considerations are presented below. I believe that they should be carefully weighed by the Congress before a final decision is reached on this bill.

1. In view of the nature of the crop, it would appear to be virtually impossible to effect sufficient control over the production and handling of tobacco seed to assure against the export of the small quantities of seed required. The imposition of a ban on export would be likely to stimulate the creation of an unwelcome bootleg activity.

In this connection it may be pointed out that the physical volume of tobacco seed sufficient to plant a large area is small; for example, it is estimated that 1,000,000 tobacco seeds weigh only 3 ounces.

Furthermore, the bill as drafted itself would make it possible for the seeds to be produced elsewhere. Small quantities of seeds exported for bona fide experimental purposes, as contemplated by H. R. 2378, could produce in a very few years enough seed to sustain a large commercial production of tobacco.

2. Although considerable quantities of American tobacco seed may be used for the commercial production of tobacco in foreign countries, such production is not necessarily dependent upon the continuation of this source of seed. In view of conclusively established principles of genetics, it appears that the periodic importation of American seed has been continued only as a matter of convenience, and that by adopting adequate safeguards to prevent cross fertilization, the seed could be produced in foreign countries. For this reason it is not believed that a prohibition of the exportation of seed, as contemplated in H. R. 2378, could have any material effect upon the production of American types of tobacco in foreign countries and, consequently, on the competition encountered by American tobacco from foreign tobacco of similar types in world markets.

3. The bill would constitute an undesirable precedent. American agriculture has benefited materially through the introduction of seeds and plants from foreign countries, to a large extent through the facilities of the Department of Agriculture. This particular legislation, while perhaps not of great importance in itself, might serve as a precedent for later, more comprehensive legislation restricting exports of seeds and plant materials from the United States which, in the long run, might lead to retaliatory action on the part of foreign countries, restricting the possibility of securing new seeds and plant materials from abroad.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

JUNE 5, 1939.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal of the House.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message, with the accompanying bill, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a communication from the judge of the juvenile court of the District of Columbia, together with a report covering the work of the juvenile court during the fiscal years July 1, 1931, to June 30, 1938.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—COMMISSIONER OF CLAIMS OF AMERICAN NATIONALS AGAINST THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following additional message from the President of the United States. which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State to the end that legislation may be enacted to authorize appropriations to provide for the adjudication by a commissioner of claims of American nationals against the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 5, 1939.

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE HIGH-PROTECTIVE TARIFF POLICY AND THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE POLICY IN THEIR RELATION TO AGRICULTURE AND OUR FOREIGN PROGRAM

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker-

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record that have already been delivered and leave the rest of the matter out.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will those remarks appear in the Appendix or on the front page at the opening of the session of the House? There has been a sort of procedure here by which extensions of remarks appear on the front page.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman is to extend his own remarks in the RECORD, and under the rules they will go in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, it is an easy matter to criticize another's conduct. Anybody can do it. It does not require a great amount of ability. The same is true of groups as well as individuals. A person who criticizes or finds fault with your conduct, plans, policies, or programs, and offers no constructive suggestions by which such conduct, plans, or programs may be improved can hardly be classed among those who are sympathetic.

When the recent agricultural appropriation bill was up for consideration some very caustic and drastic criticisms were made of our reciprocal-trade policy and its relationship to agriculture and our farm program, but I did not hear any of the critics offer a definite or concrete plan that might operate as an improvement upon either, unless it was the suggestion that we return to the high protective tariff plan of 1930.

I have listened with some interest as well as amusement to a number of speeches by Members of the House recently who have been very pronounced in their criticism of our reciprocal-trade policy and its effect on agriculture. Their remarks indicate they would have the country believe that the reduction of high tariffs following our trade agreements resulted in a loss of markets and pronounced reduction in our foreign trade, suggesting that the reciprocal-trade policy should be discontinued and we should return to the hightariff policy of 1930. The most pronounced criticism is that the trade agreements have resulted in a decrease of exports and furnished increased markets in our country for imports, saying that foreign producers are now flooding our markets in competition with the products of our farms, emphasizing the idea that a high protective tariff policy is of greater value to the average farmer than the operations of our reciprocal-trade agreements.

This is not an elementary problem, nor is it a new one. And I shall not attempt to analyze the two theories in any great detail, but will try to show the practical effects of the operation of the two policies in order that the farmer may be able to decide for himself which contributes most to his injury, or his benefit.

To see whether there is any real justification for these criticisims, it may be well to note some of the basic facts relative to the decline in our foreign trade in recent years and decide whether the reduction can be attributed to our reciprocal-trade policy or to the high protective tariff policy which preceded it. And to make the matter clear, it may be advisable first to review some of our political history for the past decade. We all remember in the election of 1928 the Republican Party carried a number of States where the people had never subscribed to the theory that high protective tariffs were of any material value to agriculture. However, it appears the President of the United States at that time felt by the people's action they were endorsing such a theory, and in the early spring of 1929 called a special session of Congress, as he stated, primarily for the purpose of enacting legislation for the benefit of agriculture. The party leaders proceeded at once to draft a law providing for a substantial increase in tariff rates not only on farm crops but manufactured products as well. The new law was approved and went into effect June 14, 1930, and naturally we would want to know what effect, if any, it had on our foreign trade. According to figures issued by the Department of Agriculture in 1938, the value of our agricultural exports, from 1929 to 1932, inclusive, the last 4 years of Republican rule, were as follows:

1930	1, 038, 018, 000
1931	752, 132, 000
1932	589, 650, 000

The value of agricultural imports for these years were:

1929	$1,899,521,000
1930	1, 161, 592, 000
1931	833, 890, 000
1932	613, 737, 000

In 1932 a Democratic President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, was elected and the Democratic Party displaced the Republican Party, our new President being inaugurated March 4, 1933. It is only fair, therefore, that we submit data showing our foreign trade the 4 years following in order that the figures may be comparable to the 4 preceding years.

The same report from the Department of Agriculture shows the value of our agricultural exports from 1933 to 1936 were as follows:

1933	$787, 343, 000
1934	668, 713, 000
1935	677, 303, 000
1936 (preliminary)	732, 826, 000

The value of agricultural imports were:

1933	$838, 952, 000
1934	933, 774, 000
1935	1, 141, 191, 000
1936	1, 538, 327, 000

It will be observed that the value of exports declined precipitately from 1929 to 1932, particularly the 3 years, 1930, 1931, and 1932, following the passage of what is known as the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. Imports decreased very much in proportion. Foreign countries say this decline in trade was due to the high tariff act, because it made it impossible for them to sell in the United States and, consequently, they were not able to buy-hence, a reduction in both exports and imports. It will be observed further, when the Democratic Party came into power, foreign trade began to increase both in exports and imports, the increase in both the first 2 years being very much in proportion. During the next 2 years imports increased more in proportion than exports. However, I have a feeling that some of the critics will not be able to obtain very much comfort from these figures in case they subscribe to the philosophy of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], in his critical speech of March 23 when referring to agricultural imports said: "This shows without a doubt that our imports are based upon our prosperity at home." He is quite correct, and instead of the slight increase in imports being an argument against our trade-agreement policy such increase is an index of improved conditions in our own country as a result of such a policy. That is, the slight increase in the value of imports during these 2 years over the value of exports indicate that we had greater increased prosperity at home than people abroad.

However, it should be observed that the value of exports or imports is not always a true index of the foreign-trade situation, for the quantity or volume of both may remain the same and the value show a decrease or an increase, or there may be a decrease in volume with a decided increase in value, and vice versa. It would be interesting, therefore, if we had the time to analyze and interpret the relationship between the value of our agricultural exports and imports and their volume or quantity. I will not be able to do this at any great detail but will submit figures showing the average annual production of cotton in the United States for 5-year periods from 1910 to 1936, together with the average annual exports, the percent of exports compared with production, and the average price during the various 5-year periods:

It will be observed from the above figures that while the average annual exports of cotton decreased nearly 40 percent in volume from the 5-year period 1910-14 to the 5-year period 1915-19, the average annual value increased approximately 40 percent, and it will be observed further that while the average annual volume of exports for the 5-year period, 1921-25, was practically the same as that compared with the 5-year period 1932-36, the average annual value thereof decreased approximately 60 percent. That is, where the average annual exports for the period 1932-36 decreased only about 15,000 bales as compared with the 5-year period 1921-25, the average annual value decreased from approximately \$877,000,000 to about \$355,000,000. We see, therefore, that the value of business may not be an index as to the volume of business done. However, the value may be a fair index as to the financial or economic status of the people in the importing country. In other words, two countries may continue to exchange their products in approximately the same volume but this would not be an index as to the financial condition of either, although the exchange value of the commodities may reflect in a large measure the purchasing power in either or both, but the purchasing power may not be entirely due to the volume of business done by either or both. On the contrary, the purchasing power may, in a measure, be determined by other matters. Nevertheless, the purchasing power of the people of any country will in a measure be determined by the price as well as volume of things they have to sell. Instead of the price being determined by the volume or quantity of things sold it is generally determined by the purchasing power of the people to whom they sell, and the two 5-year periods, 1921-25, and 1932-36 well illustrate these statements, particularly with the cotton farmer, for it will be observed in the first 5-year period noted the annual average production was 11,515,000 bales and the average price to the producer 23.36 cents per pound, whereas the average annual production for the latter 5-year period, 1932-36, we had 11,746,000 bales, a difference of only about 230,000 bales, the average price per pound received by producers was only $10\frac{1}{2}$ cents and, as we have already stated, the average annual exports of cotton for the two 5-year periods was practically the same. Therefore, it cannot be said that the 60-percent reduction in the purchasing power of the cotton farmer during the last 5-year period can be attributed to a lack of export markets, and we must look for other reasons for this enormous decrease in purchasing power.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Just why did the gentleman leave out the year 1920 and the year 1931 in preparing his chart? Was there any specific reason for doing that? The gentleman will notice that the year 1920 is not included and neither is the year 1931.

Mr. HARE. There was no particular reason for that. Apparently it was to get 5-year periods to run out with 1936, the last year for which we had figures available. The report I referred to at the outset was issued by the Department of Agriculture for 1938 and gave figures only as late as 1936; that is, I do not have the figures for 1937 and 1938.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. What years were those for?

Mr. HARE. 1921 and 1925.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. How does that average price compare with the average price for the last 5 years?

Mr. HARE. The average price for the last 5 years was 101/2 cents per pound.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And for the other years it was how much?

Mr. HARE. Twenty-three and thirty-six hundredths cents per pound for 1921 to 1925, inclusive.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. So, under a Republican administration you had an average price of 23 cents per pound, while during the first 5 years of the New Deal we had less than half of that.

Mr. HARE. Price per pound?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HARE. That is correct.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. So that the Republican administration takes care of our cotton agriculture producing group better than the New Deal has taken care of them.

Mr. HARE. If the gentleman will follow me a little further I think I will be able to disabuse his mind of that idea. I was referring to the 5-year period 1921-25, and that was before the passage of the last tariff act, and the farmers had not yet begun to pay the excessive prices for the things they were called upon to buy, and consequently had not had their purchasing power taken away from them until the 1931-36 period, when they had no money with which to buy cotton or other goods. That is, for lack of purchasing power, there was little demand for cotton goods, and prices consequently dropped or decreased.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is talking about the tariff and putting the blame on the Republican Party, but would it not have been fair to make amendments to that tariff in 1931 and 1932? The Democrats then had control of the House and the Speaker, the gentleman from Texas, and a working majority in the Senate, and for several years your party never introduced a bill or passed a line or syllable of a bill to reduce one tariff rate, not even one-half of 1 percent on aluminum pants buttons, although we had a whole lot of talk about Andy Mellon and the aluminum monopoly receiving tariff benefits.

Mr. HARE. If the gentleman is trying to set up an alibi for the 1930 act, let me say that two wrongs do not make a right. There may be some reason for failing to act in 1933, and I shall refer to that later and show that instead of passing a tariff law in 1933 a reciprocal-trade law was enacted in 1934, so that revenue tariffs may be made on a fair and scientific basis.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I mean in 1931 you had both Houses. You also had the Speaker, and under the Constitution tariff legislation must originate in the House.

Mr. HARE. No; we did not have the Senate in 1931, nor did we have the President of the United States.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. You did not need to.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman knows better than that. He knows a good deal about the tariff. He was here when the law was enacted. He well remembers when President Hoover called the Congress into extra session to enact a tariff law for agriculture, and he knows now what effect that law had upon agriculture, industry, and labor in this country.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will look at the hearings he will find that nearly every Democratic leader in the House and Senate talked for a high protective tariff on the products of their States. In the Senate Senator Harrison wanted a tariff on cotton, Walsh on copper, and Barkley for coal, and all along the line the southern fellows from Florida were for a high tariff to protect their vegetable market from foreign competition.

Mr. HARE. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech, but I know and the gentleman from Wisconsin knows the Democrats did not pass the last tariff act.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman comes from a cotton State. He is a gentleman who is a very diligent, able, and efficient legislator. The country is indeed fortunate that he is back in the House again. He is a real Jeffersonian Democrat.

Mr. HARE. I appreciate the gentleman's complimentary references and I am willing to admit the accuracy of the last sentence.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman put into the Record the amount of the export market for the past 10 or 12 years to show how the cotton export market has decreased while the South American export cotton market has increased?

Mr. HARE. I will show that the export of cotton for the last 5-year period ending in 1936 was practically the same as the two previous 5-year periods in proportion to production, and I will show that all of this cry and hullabaloo about the reciprocal-trade policy reducing the market for raw cotton is all bosh. Certainly there has been a reduction in cotton exports but the reduction cannot be charged to reciprocal-trade agreements.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman advocate a tariff on cotton to keep the cheaply produced Brazilian cotton from coming into this country? The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Fulmer] indicated the time is not far distant when the cotton producers of the South will need tariff protection.

Mr. HARE. Well, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." If that condition is reached, I shall be glad to talk with the gentleman further about it, but I do not think we have reached that point yet. It is not the Brazilian raw cotton entering this country that hurts. It is the purchase of Brazilian raw cotton by foreign manufacturers in preference to American cotton with the idea of boycotting American products as a protest against our excessively high tariff rates, and it is in this way the American cotton farmer is getting it in the neck.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. I represent the dirt farmer. They always think that everybody is doing them dirt, and that is the reason they call themselves dirt farmers. I do not agree with the gentleman on this basis, that he is trying to make believe that one party does better for the farmers than the other. My contention is that neither party does what is right by the farmer.

Mr. HARE. I am trying to present the facts in such a way the farmer himself will be able to decide which party contributes most to his benefit.

Mr. Speaker, going back to where I left off:

If a thorough investigation were made the difference between the farmers' net income for the latter 5-year period compared with the former 5-year period can be attributed to the increased cost of those things purchased and used in connection with his farming operations. If this is found to be true, it may be that the cotton farmers' income can be increased easier by decreasing his costs of production.

This seems to be the theory on which Congress acted in making provision for reciprocal-trade agreements and the theory on which our able and most efficient Secretary of State acted in formulating these agreements with foreign countries. He is trying to maintain a fair price for the things we have to sell and reduce the price of those we have to buy.

But let us examine the figures a little further and see whether we have lost the foreign market as much as some would have us believe. In the 5-year period 1921 to 1925 we observe that the average annual exports was 58 percent of the average annual production. During the next 5-year period 1926 to 1930 the average annual exports was 57 percent, and in the 5-year period 1932 to 1936 the average annual exports was 58 percent of the average annual production. In other words, the average annual exports of cotton for the three 5-year periods named as compared with production has remained practically the same. That is, our exports have not decreased any faster than our production, and the demand in foreign markets has not decreased any faster than the demand in our domestic markets.

Some will say that this will not hold true for the past 2 years. That may be true, but neither will it hold true for any other 2 years. The efficiency or failure of a theory or policy cannot be judged by comparing one year with some other one year. To get the trend you must take into consideration a period of years. As "one swallow does not make a summer," so one observation does not prove or disprove a policy or theory. At any rate, the volume of our cotton exports have remained proportionately the same for the past three 5-year periods, even though there is a marked reduction in value during the latter. But, as we have intimated, the decrease in value may be due to the decrease in purchasing power and the decrease in purchasing power may be due to increased cost because of the excessively high tariffs; that is, the cost of things farmers and others have had to buy have been out of proportion to the price of things they have had to sell, whether it be labor, products of their brain, or their crops. It is proper, therefore, to study or make some observations of the provisions and operations of the last tariff law, particularly as they refer or apply to agriculture.

The first thing to attract attention is that while there was about 4 percent increase in the tariff rate on farm crops in the 1930 act as compared with the preceding act of 1922, there was an increase of a little more than 5 percent in the rates on manufactured products; that is, the tariff on manufactured products was 25 percent more than on farm crops, the effect of which was that every time a farmer received $1 more for what he sold by reason of the tariff he is charged $1.25 more for what he buys. The farmer was, therefore, the loser of 25 cents on every such transaction.

A hasty review of some of the provisions of this act may assist in reaching a proper conclusion as to what effect the operation of the law may have had in the decrease of purchasing power of the farmer and other consumers, which, in turn, decreased the price of things they had to sell because of the decreased demand for farm crops and the products of labor.

We cannot undertake to call attention to the thousands of items provided for in the 434 pages of that law, but will undertake to refer to only a few of them, giving especial attention to those in which the farmer may be interested. This law provides a tariff or duty of 60 cents on every dollar's worth of cups, saucers, plates, and so forth; 65 cents on every dollar's worth of fruit jars, tumblers, lamp chimneys, and so forth; 40 to 70 cents on every dollar's worth of paint; 35 cents on every dollar's worth of castor oil; 75 cents on every dollar's worth of cologne; $1 on a $5 crosscut saw; $3.50 on a $10 pair of wagon harness; 70 cents on a $2 safety razor; $6.70 on a $6 shotgun; $14 on a $40 saddle; $11.25 on a $20 suit of clothes; $9.50 on a $10 clock; and $6 on a $20 bicycle. Let a farmer boy buy a $4 coat with a rabbitskin collar attached, and if he is picking cotton to pay for it it will take him 3 days to earn enough to pay the $2.50 tariff duty, making the coat cost $6.50. If he wants to buy a bicycle it will take him an entire week earning $1 a day clear money to get enough to pay the duty on it. If he desires to buy a single-barrel breechloading shotgun it will take him 2½ weeks to earn the $15.50 to pay the tariff on it; that is, it will take 4 weeks, or one-twelfth of a year, for this boy to earn money enough to pay the tariff duty on these three articles—coat, bicycle, shotgun.

To be a little more specific, I have listed a number of articles the average farmer is likely to purchase in the run of a year and have computed or estimated the tariff or duty provided for on each article. It will furnish some idea as to about how much he is paying annually for himself and family in the way of tariff duties.

Of course, this may not represent exactly what the average farmer will pay in the way of tariff duties each year, but it will give him a good idea as to what goes with his income and why his purchasing power is no more than it is. On the contrary, this may represent only a small percent of the things the farmer buys annually. I know many things are not included in this list, and I think it is safe to say that the average tariff duty paid by the general run of farmers will range from $100 to $1,000 per annum, depending on the amount of his purchases. The same will apply to the laborer or anyone else.

The speeches made by high protectionists during the last few weeks in an effort to make the farmer believe that his success, prosperity, and happiness depend upon a high protective tariff is not a new thing; it has been going on for years.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield right there? Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. As long as 25 percent of our exports are agricultural products, and as long as 50 percent of our imports are agricultural products, does not the gentleman feel that agriculture is getting the short end of the deal?

Mr. HARE. I am trying to show that agriculture has had the short end of the deal for 20 years, and if the gentleman will give me time I will prove it.

Mr. Speaker, again going back to where I left off, let me say that if this were the first time such representations were made, it would be logical and proper to give them the reasonable and natural weight they would ordinarily be entitled to, but they have been made so often and refuted by subsequent experiences they have lost some of their force. We go back to the passage of the 1922 tariff law and find Mr. Fordney, one of the authors of the bill, saying:

My friends, as far as rates are concerned, this is purely an agricultural bill.

This was a very emphatic statement showing that the tariff bill under consideration at that time was for the benefit of agriculture, but in less than 2 years following we find Representatives coming from the same section of the country declaring that the tariff was of little value and that it was not effective, saying that the condition of agriculture was going from bad to worse all the time, and these same men were demanding the passage of a bill that would "make the tariff effective."

In the light of such evidence we are forced to conclude that the framers of the 1922 Tariff Act were mistaken in their contentions in that it would operate in the interest of agriculture. It did not, for a few years later that friend of the farmer, the lamented gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Haugen, in discussing a bill he proposed at that time for farm relief, pointed out that about the time the law was passed corn was selling for 50 cents per bushel and a wagon could be bought for $50 and a binder for $110, saying that "generally 100 bushels of corn would buy a wagon and 200 bushels buy a binder."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Hare] has expired.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes. We have consumed a great deal of his time by interruptions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPARKMAN). Is that agreeable to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL]? Mr. ENGEL. It is, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARE. I appreciate this courtesy very much.

Mr. Speaker, resuming at the point where I was interrupted, he pointed out further that at that time corn was still selling for 50 cents per bushel, but wagons were selling around $135 and binders around $235, saying, "It now requires around 200 bushels of corn to pay for a wagon and from 400 to 500 bushels to pay for a binder. The same is true in purchasing other implements and clothing and most of the things the farmer has to buy." The point he was making was to the effect that the high protective tariff had increased the price of wagons, binders, and other things the farmer had to buy, but had had no effect whatever on the price of corn, although there was at the time a tariff of 15 cents per bushel on corn.

It will be recalled further when the 1930 tariff bill was up for consideration its author in the House, Mr. Hawley, spoke at length, outlining in considerable detail the benefits to be derived from the operation of the proposed law for agriculture. We note specifically where he illustrated his argument by referring to what he described as a 230-acre typical southern Ohio farm, saying that under the act such a farmer would receive on an average of $1,206 per annum, and that this would represent the benefits he would receive from the operation of the law. He proceeded further to show that the expenditures he would have to make in the way of tariff duties would amount to approximately $182 per annum, claiming that this average farm would obtain an average annual net benefit of a little more than $1,000. He gave another illustration of a general farm in Iowa where he made calculations, and showed that such a farm would get a benefit of $1,669 annually and pay duties on articles purchased for the use of farm and household the sum of $171, making a net benefit to such a farm of a little more than $1,500 per annum. I refer to these simply to illustrate how positive and pronounced the proponents of a high protective tariff were during the discussion of the Tariff Act of 1930 so that the people might be able to properly evaluate the arguments they are now making against the reciprocal-trade policy and in favor of a return to the high tariff rates of former days.

If the Ohio and Iowa farmers referred to by the author of the bill should today read the glowing arguments made in support of the highest tariff bill of record and then take stock of the results that followed, they would find little consolation in the arguments now being made against our reciprocal-trade agreements and in favor of higher tariffs. On the other hand, if they would take time to read the prophetic speech made about the same time by the Honorable John N. Garner, then a Member of the House and now Vice President of the United States, they would recognize him as a man of political wisdom and prophecy and would have every reason to become his political disciples and join hands with those who believe that if he were promoted and given an opportunity he would aid agriculture, labor, and industry by giving them a sane interpretation and a safe solution of their existing problems.

We will not attempt to quote at length from Mr. Garner, but immediately following the passage of the conference report he said in part as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, carrying the highest rates ever written into an American tariff law, has become a law despite the protests of virtually all farm organizations and warnings of many large manufacturers who predict that the new rates will practically destroy foreign markets for many American products.

To my mind-

He said-

this tariff bill violates every precept of common sense, justice, and sound economics. Under the guise of protecting the products of agriculture, the Republican majority in both Houses has inflicted upon the country industrial rates that are indefensible; rates that can only serve to add to the burden the farmers and consumers have carried for years; rates that will tend to reduce and in fact eliminate, the foreign markets for many of our products, both industrial and agricultural.

The speaker could not have pictured or described the results to follow the passage of that act more accurately than if he had waited 5 years following its passage and then observed in every detail the effects upon agriculture and industry. But we call attention to another prophetic statement of the now Vice President, when he said:

The administration leaders have proceeded upon the assumption that there has been no change; and that the old panaceas can still be applied; that foreign consumers must come to America for their raw materials and raw merchandise. In my opinion, their blindness in this respect can have only one effect—reduction of our exports, which have provided employment for millions of American workers; reduction of the trade balance, which is responsible in no small degree for the great national prosperity following the World War; and place American agriculture and industry upon a basis whereby expansion and employment will be limited to the demands of the domestic markets.

No prophecy of any man of any time in history has been fulfilled with greater accuracy than those predicted in 1930 by the now Vice President of the United States, for certainly there has been a reduction of exports and the unemployment of millions of people have followed; certainly there has been a reduction of the trade balance which has interfered seriously with our former great national prosperity; and certainly both agriculture and industry are now looking to our domestic markets for the consumption of our raw materials as well as our finished products. All the speaker said at that time would follow the passage of the high protective tariff act has come to pass. But the tragedy of the situation is that some of the men who took part in the passage of the law which paralyzed practically every economic activity of this country now have the audacity to come before Congress, after a new and scientific trade policy has been established, and attempt to convince the American people that the reopening of the channels of trade for agriculture and industry with foreign markets is to go back to the tariff policy of 1930, 1931, and 1932.

But let us analyze some of the recent criticisms of our reciprocal-trade policy and see if there is any virtue in them. In the address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] on March 23 he undertook to show the injurious effects of the reciprocal-trade agreements on agriculture as contrasted with what he referred to as benefits derived from the high protective tariff. He spoke at length in an effort to show that the reciprocal-trade agreements had had two effects on agriculture. One was they had destroyed our foreign markets and the other that we had lost our home markets, saying rather emphatically:

The American farmer has seen his foreign market disappear and his home market drasticaly surrendered to the foreign producer.

It would have been very interesting if the critic had submitted figures at this point in his speech showing to what extent our exports and imports increased following the inauguration of our reciprocal-trade policy as compared with the decrease immediately following the passage of the last tariff act.

In his effort to justify the passage of that act he stated:

Another proof that the Tariff Act of 1930 had nothing to do with the 1929 depression is that our imports of items on the free list fell off in exactly the same percentage as our imports of items on which the tariff was collected. This shows without a doubt that our imports are based upon our prosperity at home.

This is a confession you would hardly expect from a high tariff advocate, for he says that following this tariff act, "Our imports of items on the free list fell off in exactly the same percentage as our imports of items on which the tariff was collected," thereby admitting that the high tariff failed to do what they said it would do, because he states emphatically, "Items on the free list fell off in exactly the same percentage as items on which the tariff was collected," showing conclusively that the tariff had been of no benefit whatever to agriculture.

To verify this conclusion, he proceeds in the next sentence and virtually admits that the tariff law referred to had not been of any benefit to agriculture when he said, "This shows without a doubt that our imports are based upon our prosperity at home," not as a consequence of "high tariffs," but on account of "prosperity at home." This is exactly in harmony with the theory on which the reciprocal agreements are based. They are designed primarily for the purpose of increasing prosperity at home. Again we quote from the very able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway]. He says:

If the act of 1930 is blamed for our decline in foreign trade from 1929 to 1932, then to be fair, trade-treaty proponents must also give it credit for the rising in our foreign trade from 1932 until the time the trade-treaty program came into effect.

In other words, he admits in one sentence that the high Tariff Act of 1930 was responsible for the decline, and then insists that by the same operation the same tariff act should be credited for the increase in exports during 1933-34. His logic reminds me of the poet who said:

He wiggled in and he wobbled out, And left the people still in doubt Whether the snake that made the track Was crossing the road or coming back. He loses sight of the fact that following the enormous decline in foreign trade in 1930, 1931, and 1932 there was an election in this country, where the people repudiated the high protective tariff policy, elected a new President, and put a new political party in power, and every reasonably well-advised person will say that the increase in foreign trade that followed in 1933 and 1934 was inspired by the confidence the people of this country and of the world placed in the actions taken by the new President and the new Democratic Congress. It is absurd on its face to admit that the Tariff Act of 1930 was responsible for the decline in foreign trade for 3 years and then say its operation should be credited with the increased foreign trade that followed for the next 2 years.

The speaker then undertakes to give the Tariff Act of 1930 credit for all of the revival in foreign trade following the defeat of the Republican Party in 1932 when he declared:

Also, it must be given credit for the increase in trade from 1932 to date with countries with which we do not have trade treaties. As a matter of fact, there is every reason to believe that our trade with treaty countries would have increased to a large extent even without the treaties, as was the case before the treaties were entered into.

The principle upon which this statement is based cannot stand, because if the Tariff Act of 1930 is admitted to be responsible for the loss of our foreign trade for the 3 years following, we cannot imagine how it is possible for the same forces or influences to react and then become responsible for the increased foreign trade immediately following the elections of 1932 and the establishment of our reciprocal-trade policy. As a matter of fact, our exports to countries with which we do not have trade treaties have not increased in proportion as exports to those with which we have such agreements. In support of this statement I quote from an address of Edgar W. Smith, vice president, General Motors Overseas Corporation, in New York, March 10, 1939, when he says:

Since 1934 our exports to countries with which we have trade agreements have increased year by year more rapidly than our exports to countries with which we do not have agreements. In 1937 exports of American agricultural products to countries with which we had trade agreements were 42 percent greater than

In 1937 exports of American agricultural products to countries with which we had trade agreements were 42 percent greater than they were in 1935, when only one trade agreement was in effect, while exports of farm products to non-trade-agreement countries were 4 percent less than in 1935. In the 12 months ended June 20, 1938, our exports of farm products to trade-agreement countries increased in value $81,000,000, or more than 39 percent, over the value for the preceding 12 months, while exports of these products to non-trade-agreement countries in the same period increased only a little more than 14 percent.

It is practically impossible to secure exact data for each and every item of export and import, but the monthly index figures for exports and imports as indicated by the 1938 Supplement of the Department of Commerce on Current Business show the total value of exports decreased 58 percent comparing 1930 with 1933, with a 20 percent increase comparing 1936 with 1938, whereas the figures for imports show a 57 percent decrease in the first comparison and 17 percent increase in the second.

However, in the quantity or volume of exports the index figures show a decrease of 37 percent, comparing 1930 with 1933, and a decrease of 30 percent in imports, whereas the volume of exports following the establishment of our reciprocal-trade policy increased 22 percent, comparing the year 1936 with 1938, although the volume of imports, with a corresponding comparison, show a decrease of 20 percent. In other words, there was a decided decrease in our business with foreign nations for the 3 years following the passage of the 1930 Tariff Act, whereas there has been an appreciable increase in business with foreign nations during the 3 years following the establishment of our reciprocal-trade policy in 1935.

There is no doubt but what the 1930 act was the straw that broke the camel's back of our economic structure, although we had been riding for a fall since the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act in 1922, when industry and party leaders insisted that by the enactment of that law industry would be able to aid agriculture by paying higher prices for raw materials; labor would receive higher wages, which, in turn, would pay the farmer better prices for his farm crops and food products. The program sounded reasonable and both agriculture and labor relied upon the promises. But the usual thing happened. Instead of passing some of the profits resulting from high prices on to agriculture and labor, new and highly improved machinery and equipment were installed, old machinery speeded up, and the stretch-out system inaugurated. Increasing unemployment with decreasing purchasing power followed until 1930, when the Republican Party announced by its action there would be another decided increase over the then existing tariff rates. Foreign governments immediately retal ated by increasing their rates accordingly, with the result that channels of trade were closed and business generally collapsed.

The hum of machinery was no longer heard, labor was unemployed, and agriculture paralyzed. Everything was at a standstill, and to prevent continued stagnation in business it was necessary to remove the cause in an orderly and scientific manner so that the channels of business may be reopened, and agriculture and labor given another opportunity for life. Congress, therefore, provided for the inauguration of our reciprocal-trade program, the wisdom of which is being justified and approved as the program is enlarged from time to time. It is true, some of us thought our party made a mistake and was subject to criticism in 1933 when it failed to proceed at once to repeal or reduce the excessive tariff rates then prevailing, but we are now convinced that Congress pursued the better course and acted more wisely by providing for reciprocal-trade agreements which will effect the same results in a more scientific manner and obviate retaliations and boycotting by other

If any of the critics have shown where the reciprocal-trade pelicy and the trade agreements have operated to the injury of the farmer as much as the high protective tariffs I have not seen or heard it. Or if they can show definitely and conclusively where the average farmer has lost more by the operation of the reciprocal-trade agreements than he has by the operation of the high protective tariff I, for one, will be willing to change my mind and vote to abandon the policy. Otherwise, I think it is high time for the high protectionists to quit trying to fool the farmer. [Applause.]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order heretofore made, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States in his speeches and messages has tried to convince himself and the Nation that we have nothing to fear from a large public debt. In his message of January 4, in expressing this idea to the Nation at large, he used the following language:

Many people-

He said-

have the idea that as a nation we are overburdened with debt and are spending more than we can afford. That is not so. Despite our Federal Government expenditures, the entire debt of our national economic system, public and private together, is no larger today than it was in 1929, and the interest is far less than it was in 1929.

Mr. Speaker, with this statement in mind, I want to examine the debt structure as it is today and as it was in 1929. Let us see whether or not the statement of the President that the National, State, and private indebtedness is no larger today than it was in 1929 gives a true picture of conditions as they exist today. Let us eliminate the camouflage and look at the financial structure as it stands today and as it stood then.

I ask unanimous consent to place into the RECORD table I, compiled by myself from the figures taken from the Department of Commerce.

TABLE I .- Long-term private indebtedness 1 [In billions of dollars]

 Estimated unofficially by Department of Commerce. No official Department of Commerce estimates available.
 Includes apartment homes larger than 4-family, hotels, office buildings Taken from table 339, Domestic Commerce Series No. 96.

This table covers the long-term private indebtedness and the public indebtedness.

These Department of Commerce figures give the longterm private, national, State, and local public indebtedness for 1930 and 1937, as follows:

The one to open the st convision	1930	1937
Long-term private indebtedness National debt State and local public debt	$84, 500, 000, 000 16, 600, 000, 000 15, 800, 000, 000	$70, 300, 000, 000 36, 700, 000, 000 19, 200, 000, 000
Total	116, 900, 000, 000	126, 200, 000, 000

Thus we find that the long-term private debt plus the national, State, and local public debt was $9,300,000,000 larger in 1937 than in 1930. The Department of Commerce has no official estimate of the short-term private debt nor of the long-term private debt of 1929. It estimates unofficially the long-term private debt for that year at $85,000,000,000. However, the national debt of that year was $16,000,000,000, and the State and local public debt was $15,600,000,000. The public debt was $800,000,000 smaller in 1929 than in 1930, while the private long-term debt was $500,000,000 larger. So the 1930 figures would be approximately the same as the 1929 figures. This shows an increase of $23,500,000,000 in 1937 over 1930 in our public indebtedness, and a decrease of $14,200,000,000 in our long-term private indebtedness, or a net increase in the national, State, and local and in long-term private debt of $9,300,000,000 in 1937 over 1930.

It is rather interesting to note that of the $14,200,000,000 decrease in the long-term private indebtedness, the total industrial loans or debts were decreased $3,000,000,000, farm mortgages were decreased $2,000,000,000, nonfarm mortgages on one- to four-family homes $5,000,000,000, and other urban real-estate mortgages on apartment houses, hotels, and so forth were decreased $3,700,000,000.

These decreases were not brought about by payment. The vast majority of this debt reduction was brought about through foreclosures of real-estate mortgages on one- to four-family homes, large apartment houses on which bonds had been floated all over the country, and other real property.

I am inserting at this point in the RECORD a table compiled by myself, giving the total number of Federal landbank loans foreclosed since the organization of the Federal land bank in 1917, and also giving the number of Federal land-bank loans and Commissioner's loans foreclosed from March 1, 1933, to March 31, 1939.

Federal land-bank mortgages and Land Bank Commissioner mortgages foreclosed on from 1917 to Mar. 31, 1939

	Number	Amount

Total foreclosed on from Mar. 1, 1933, to Mar. 31, 1939	56, 553	162, 425, 518
Federal land bank foreclosures pending on Mar. 31, 1939 Land Bank Commissioner foreclosures pending on Mar. 31, 1939	5, 210 4, 040	19, 878, 884 9, 351, 309
Total foreclosures pending on Mar. 31, 1939	9, 250 65, 803 38, 951	29, 230, 193 191, 656, 711 142, 135, 459

It will be seen from this table that we foreclosed or started foreclosure proceedings on 65,803 loans, amounting to $191,656,711 from March 1, 1933, to March 31, 1939, as against 38,951 loans foreclosed on, amounting to $142,135,-459 from the organization of the Federal land bank in 1917 to March 1, 1933. In other words, the number of loans upon which we foreclosed or started forclosure from March 1. 1933, to March 13, 1939-a period of 6 years-is almost double the number of loans we foreclosed on from the organization of the Federal land bank in 1917 to March 1. 1933. The amount foreclosed on in the last 6 years is approximately $50,000,000 higher than the total amount foreclosed on from 1917 to March 1, 1933. The fact that I wanted to point out is that when the 9,250 pending cases are completed, there will have been wiped out by foreclosure since March 1, 1933, nearly $200,000,000 of debt is this one

I have before me figures as of November 30, 1938, on the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation up to November 30, 1938, has foreclosed or had in the process of foreclosing 165,139 homes, of which 15,850 were withdrawn, leaving a net number of homes which they expect to acquire at 149,289. They are now managing 87,421 homes, representing an original loan of $478,350,000, or an average of $5,600 per loan. If we apply this average amount for loans foreclosed to the total amount which they expect to acquire, we find that they will have foreclosed on these 149,289 homes upon which a total loan was made of nearly $336,000,000.

It is interesting further to note that the total number of loans made were 1,018,000 and the total amount of the loans was $3,093,000,000. Fourteen and seven-tenths percent of the number of loans are foreclosed or in the process of foreclosure, representing 35 percent of the total sum loaned. Of the properties disposed of, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation took a loss on an average of $657 per loan foreclosed on

I have no desire to criticize the Federal land bank nor the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. It is only fair to say that these loans are the poorest loans they had. I believe it is safe to say that the $10,700,000,000 farm and urban mortgage debt by which the private indebtedness was reduced was to a large extent wiped out by foreclosure as is illustrated by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. So in summarizing, we find that the greater portion of the reduction in the long-term private indebtedness from 1930 to 1937 was not by payment, but by foreclosures, compromises with creditors, and methods other than payment. We find that when these foreclosures are completed over $1,000,-000,000 of private debt will have been wiped out since March 1933 on H. O. L. C. loans and Federal land-bank loans alone. This does not include, of course, the amount involved in foreclosures of mortgages on home and farms owned by individuals, banks, life-insurance companies, loan associations, and other corporations.

The President, however, in his figures includes the short-term private indebtedness. I ask unanimous consent to include in the Record table II, compiled by myself.

Taken from the book entitled "Debts and Recovery, 1929 to 1937. The Twentieth Century Fund," as determined by special committee of the Twentieth Century Fund on debt adjustment.

I am including table No. 2, which was compiled by me from the report of the committee on the twentieth century fund on debt adjustment published in 1938, and just a short time off the press. The twentieth-century fund gives the total Federal, State, and local public indebtedness, plus the long- and short-term private indebtedness for 1929 in excess of $250,000,000,000—it does not say how much in excess, so we must accept the figures as given—and for 1937 at approximately $250,000,000,000. I have been unable so far to find any 1938 figures. However, there is no doubt but what both the public and private indebtedness for 1938 will exceed that of 1937.

It is interesting to note in this table that tax-exempt securities, representing debts on Government bonds, increased $21,000,000,000 during that period-representing a total of $53,000,000,000 in 1937—corporation bonded indebtedness increased $3,000,000,000, the amount owing policyholders on life-insurance policies increased $8,000,000,000, and the amount mutual savings banks owe depositors $1,000,000,000. During the same period mortgages-farm and urban-according to this table, were decreased $5,000,000,000, shortterm debts receivable at banks and nonfinancial corporations reduced $23,000,000,000, and commercial bank debts in the form of deposits, including $4,000,000,000 of interbank debts, were decreased $1,000,000,000. According to the twentiethcentury fund. Federal Reserve member banks' losses on loans and investments from 1929 to 1937 were $4,406,000,000, chief life-insurance company losses were $1,145,000,000, and mutual savings banks in New York were more than $400,000,000, the three items representing a total loss from 1929 to 1937 of $5,951,000,000.

Again, the farm and urban mortgage debt was reduced in the main by foreclosure. Short-term debts receivable at banks and nonfinancial corporations were reduced in large part by the failure of such banks to lend money and in the wiping out of loans made by the selling of collateral securities.

A study of the situation shows that much of the short-term indebtedness was wiped out in the depression through selling of collateral held by banks on stocks, reloans, and through foreclosures in both real-estate mortgages and collateral security instead of payment.

It further shows the need for sound financing in order to bring back business. Whatever can be said, there certainly is nothing for the President to boast about a condition such as this

Before I proceed further I want to point out that both the principal and interest of the 1929 public and private debt was paid out of an income produced of $81,000,000,000. The principal and interest of the 1938 public and private debt was paid out of an income produced of less than $62,000,000,000. The gross appropriations of Congress made in 1938 for the fiscal year 1939 were more than $11,361,815,654, or nearly 20 percent of the national income produced for that year.

At the end of 1937 our national debt was $36,700,000,000. The Treasury report of May 18, 1939, gives the same national debt as $40,229,352,286, not including guaranteed loans made by Government corporations. Now the President tells us it will reach $44,457,845,210 by June 30, 1940. We find that our National, State, local public, plus our private indebtedness was in 1937 in excess of $250,000,000,000. When we add to this $250,000,000,000 approximately an $8,000,000,000 increase in our national debt, plus the increase in our State and local public debt, much of which was induced by Federal legislation, plus the increase in our private debt, we will find that our National, State, and local, plus our private debt will by June 30, 1940, amount to somewhere between two hundred and seventy-five and three hundred billion dollars. This means that our national debt will equal 34 percent, our National, State, and local public debt 48 percent, and our National, State, local, and private debt will exceed 200 percent of the assessed valuation of every piece of real and personal property placed on the assessment rolls by the local assessing officers in the 48 States. The assessed valuation of the 48 States in 1936 was approximately $134,000,-000,000. And in the face of these facts, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury tell us smilingly that we have nothing to fear; that we are not "overburdened with debt" and that we are not "spending more than we can afford."

I want to call attention to the item classified as "shortterm debts receivable at banks and nonfinancial corporations." While the corporation's bonded debt usually represents buildings, permanent capital, and so forth, the shortterm debts which business owes to banks, as represented by this item, represent loans made to business to supply its working capital, or short-term loans made with which to buy raw materials, which loans are usually paid back when the finished product is sold. For instance, a furniture factory may buy lumber and give its note for 60 or 90 days. The note is taken to the bank and discounted and it is then paid out of furniture sold. The manufacturer sells to the retailer on a short-term note. The retailer sells the furniture to the customer and with the money received from the customer, he pays his note. He may take the customer's note for the purchase price of the furniture, discount it at the bank, and pay the bank. The customer may pay his note out of his earnings. In other words, this short-term money may turn over four to six times a year. It is this class of capital which we have needed so badly to keep our factories and business places going.

I think the most interesting part of the chart is the following: The two items classified as tax-exempt securities representing debts of Government bodies and the short-term debt receivable at banks and nonfinancial institutions aggregated $85,000,000,000 in 1929 and $83,000,000,000 in 1937. The interesting fact, however, is that while in 1929, $32,000,-000,000 of this money was invested in tax-exempt securities and $53,000,000,000,000 in short-term debts receivable at banks and nonfinancial institutions, in 1937, $53,000,000,000,000 was invested in tax-exempt securities and only $30,000,000,000 in short-term debts receivable at banks. In other words, $23,-000,000,000 of this capital which was used in 1929 to finance business undoubtedly went to tax-exempt securities. This is more forceful in view of the fact that other items remained the same or varied very little.

Capital and especially short-term capital is the blood stream of business and industry. This decrease of $23,000,-000,000 in short-term loans would have turned over from four to six times a year and would have furnished business and industry with from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-five billions of dollars annually in short-term loans. The lack of this capital has been the cause of the pernicious financial anemia from which business and industry has been suffering. The restoration of this working capital is the only cure I know for the disease.

The President recognized the condition but offered no cure in his message of January 4 when he said, "We suffer from a great unemployment of capital." I am here trying to point out one of the reasons why we are suffering from an unemployment of capital.

Thus, the share of the burden of public debt that business bears does not lie only in its share of the interest and principal which it must pay through taxation, but the real damage is done by the flight of capital from business to tax-exempt securities as shown herein. A spending and borrowing program is not only a burden on industry and business in that industry and business must bear its share of the interest and principal payments of the debt, in addition to paying dividends or interest on its own working capital, but public debt diverts capital from the blood stream of industry and business into the Federal Treasury, and is the principal cause of this pernicious financial anemia from which we have been suffering. Only by stopping this spending and borrowing program can we force private capital back into the blood stream of industry and business and bring about a permanent recovery.

A discussion of the question of public and private debt would not be complete without discussing the question as to where the burden of that debt falls. I would divide debt-public and private-into two classes. Into the first class I would place bonds issued by the Government, whether national, State, or municipal, as direct obligations where the money borrowed is used in nonproductive enterprise, such as highways, streets, parks, buildings, and so forth. While money spent in this way provides temporary employment and may for a time speed up production, in the final analysis the interest, principal, and cost of maintenance will have to be raised by taxation, as the investment in itself is nonproductive. Money spent in nonproductive enterprise is a handicap eventually to recovery in times of depression and tends to bring about a depression in times of prosperity.

Into the second class I would place bonds issued, whether private or public, for the purpose of investing the money in what I call productive enterprise. In this class of bonds the interest and ultimately the principal is paid out of production or out of newly created wealth.

ILLUSTRATIONS

First. A public utility, whether owned privately or publicly, issues its bonds. The money is spent building a power dam. The dam produces electricity. The electricity is sold to the consumer. With the money realized from its sale, the company pays the interest and ultimately the principal of the bond issue.

Second. A farmer borrows money from the Federal land bank or from private sources with which to purchase a farm. He grows crops, thereby producing new wealth. He sells the crops and with the money realized from the production of this new wealth he pays the interest and ultimately the principal of the mortgage.

Third. A home owner borrows money from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Federal Housing Administration, or from private sources with which to build, buy, or finance a home. He works in a factory. His wages are paid out of the wealth he has produced. With those wages he pays the interest and ultimately the principal on the loan.

The above are a few illustrations of what I mean by productive enterprise. The interest and ultimately the principal of this class of investment are paid out of production and not by taxation. Instead of being a handicap to recovery in times of depression, they help to bring about recovery. Instead of retarding production or being a hindrance to business in times of prosperity, they accelerate permanent production and help maintain prosperity.

The National, State, and local public interest-bearing debt referred to herein is almost as a whole spent either for operating costs or if it has been granted to States in public buildings, lots, and so forth, represents nonproductive enterprise. The interest and ultimately the principal payment of this debt must be paid through taxation. The business of the Nation well knows that it must pay out of industrial production not only the interest and ultimately the principal of this huge private debt but it must also pay out of production and by taxation the interest and ultimately the principal of this tremendous National, State, and local debt.

Business knows that to exist it must pass this burden ultimately on to the consumer or take it out of profits which, at the present time, do not exist as a rule. It is this tremendous burden, together with the flight of capital to tax-exempt securities, which retards production and makes it so difficult to bring about recovery.

May I point out, in closing, just two other facts? First, that in 1938 the income produced was not quite $62,000,-000,000, while the total tax levied—National, State, and local—during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, was $14,653,-000,000, according to Bradstreet's Review. This is nearly $2,000,000,000 more than all the income produced by all the factories in the United States and nearly three times the income produced by all the farms in the United States during 1938. It equals 23.6 percent of the income produced by the entire Nation. This tremendous tax was paid by a country that is financially sick, out of an income produced of less than $62,000,000,000.

I do not have the total tax paid in 1929, the year to which the President refers. However, I do know that the Federal Government, not including State and local taxes, took out of a sick country and sick business in various taxes, fees, and so forth, classified as receipts during 1938, $6,241,661,227, or an amount that equaled more than 10 percent of the income produced in the entire country, as against $4,033,250,225 taken in during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and taken out of an income produced of $81,000,000,000 in 1929, the most prosperous year in the history of our Nation.

May I conclude with the following two quotations—one by Andrew Jackson, the patron saint of the Democratic Party, and so often quoted by President Roosevelt—which reads as follows:

I am one of those who do not believe that a national debt is a national blessing, but rather a curse to a republic. (Taken from The Life of Andrew Jackson, by J. S. Bassett, p. 346.)

The second quotation is a statement from a speech which was made by President Roosevelt in 1932, and reads as follows:

It is futile to expect any important economy from an administration which is committed to the idea that we ought to center control of everything in Washington as rapidly as possible. I am as certain as any mortal man can be of anything in the future that from the moment we set our hands openly and frankly and courageously to this problem, we shall have reached the end of our long, hard, downward road and shall have started on the upward trail. Join me and let's go.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein three tables compiled by myself.

CENTENARY OF THE PRESS GALLERY

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the current year is the one hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the Press Gallery of Congress. This institution, famous in journalistic circles and known throughout the civilized world, dates back to January 1839, when the Senate Committee on the Contingent Fund brought in a report, which the Senate adopted, recommending that "the front seats in the eastern gallery be set aside for reporters."

From a mere handful of male correspondents in 1839, representing a few scattering newspapers on the eastern seaboard, the Press Gallery has grown until it now has a membership of 513, of whom 38 are women. The newspapers represented are located in over 300 cities of America and in quite a number of foreign countries. Representatives of journals in all of the leading capitals of the world are included in the membership of the Press Gallery. A casual observer, hearing the telegraph instruments click in the House and Senate press sections, would hardly imagine that on an average newsday between 50,000 and 60,000 words are telegraphed from the United States Capitol to publications all over the world, and that on extra special occasions the telegraph file mounts to 150,000 or more words a day.

The centenary of the Press Gallery brings before the mind's eye in ghostly array the figures of many great men who in the far-away yesteryear not only recorded the doings of Congress with distinction and brillancy but who, in many instances, served as the advisers and counsellors of statesmen, such journalists as Henry Watterson, Horace Greeley, Murat Halstead, and Whitelaw Reid. [Applause.] members of the Press Gallery, after an interim, came back to Washington as members of the United States Senate-Medill McCormick of Illinois and Arthur Capper of Kansas. It fell to my lot to be the only correspondent who went directly from the Press Gallery to a seat in Congress. [Applause.] Robert J. Wynne graduated from the gallery to the office of consul general at London and later was Postmaster General. Walter Eli Clark left the gallery to become Governor of Alaska. Many members of the gallery have gone into consular and diplomatic positions and have made their mark in the Foreign Service of our country. Some of the mightiest men in the world of journalism and politics have been identified with the Press Gallery, such men as Watterson and Greeley, for instance. To the best of my recollection Mark Twain was never a member of the Press Gallery, but he used to come down and hobnob with us frequently and, being a man of many idiosyncrasies, he always dazzled us by appearing in a suit of creamy white, even though it might be in the dead of winter with a blizzard raging outside.

About the turn of the century, when I joined the gallery, there were two occasions when the gentlemen of the press and the Members of Congress dressed up in their killing best, each vying with each other for dazzling sartorial effects. Those occasions were the opening and closing days of Congress. The most outstanding members of the Press Gallery, the tycoons of our profession, never thought of appearing on one of those extraordinary days without being arrayed in silk hat and Prince Albert. Some of us who belonged to the common and garden variety of correspondents could not sport such clothes, but we beheld with awe and admiration our leaders who were dressed in a manner so pleasing to the eye. In what is now a part of the House restaurant downstairs, there was a long bar with sawdust and brass rail where, on those stellar days, certain journalists and statesmen acquired the spirit and aplomb that facilitated their efforts to uphold the dignity of the American Nation. [Laughter.]

For well on to three-quarters of a century there were no women members of the Press Gallery, and the males of the species bitterly resented the oncoming drive of women to secure press-gallery privileges. This no doubt was due to a hunch that having women around would be a restraining influence on speech and conduct. Besides, there was a sort of feeling among the journalistic elders that woman's place is over a tub and not over a typewriter. Mrs. Isabel Worrall Ball, a very estimable lady with a strong mind, was the first woman to edge her way into the Press Gallery, and for a time she was greeted with about the same warm hospitality and cheeriness with which a victim of smallpox would be hailed. Gradually the prejudice against women wore off, however, and with their coming, cussing became more restrained and fewer hairy chests were exposed to view on hot days. [Laughter.]

For 28 years continuously, beginning in 1901, I was a member of the corps of Washington correspondents, and I shall always regard my service as president of the National Press Club as one of the greatest honors that ever came to me, or that could ever come to anyone, for that matter. The sweetest recollections of my life are centered in the Press Gallery upstairs, which was the scene of my daily labors. From that point of vantage and from the similar gallery in the Senate I watched the world go around, happier, I confess, as a moulder of public opinion and as a chronicler of history than I can ever hope to be again. I had many rich experiences as a member of the Press Gallery, and as long as life lasts I shall bear with me fond and endearing memories of many noble characters among the correspondents with whom I had the privilege of being associated as a writer who have preceded me into the unknown land. [Applause.] March 4, 1929, after spending 28 years in the Press Gallery, years of excitement and glamour, covering a momentous period in the history of America and of the world, I moved downstairs to a seat in the House, where I have been permitted to enjoy the fine friendships of my congressional colleagues during the last 10 years. While I appreciate the great honor of these splendid companionships and associations, nevertheless, having been raised in the arms of the press, to the press I expect to return, and a few more controversial votes such as we cast on June 1 probably will accelerate my return. [Applause and laughter.]

All of this is preliminary to saying that a very dear friend of mine and former colleague of the Press Gallery, Maj. Paul J. McGahan, Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer, has written a brief history of the Press Gallery which is of absorbing interest. Major McGahan was a member of the standing committee, the committee that rules the Press Gallery, during the Seventy-fourth, Seventy-fifth, and Seventy-sixth Congresses, and was admirably qualified to accomplish the task to which he addressed himself. On behalf of the members of the Press Gallery, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including this document prepared by Major McGahan. [Applause.]

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE RULES GOV-ERNING THE PRESS GALLERIES OF THE CONGRESS AND SOME HISTORI-CAL DATA CONCERNING THE STANDING COMMITTEE OF CORRESPONDENTS, PREPARED FROM SOURCE RECORDS BY PAUL J. McGahan, PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER, AND MEMBER OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE FOR THE SEVENTY-FOURTH, SEVENTY-FIFTH, AND SEVENTY-SIXTH

In the early days of the Congress, newspaper coverage was relatively incomplete, but as far back as 100 years ago, in the Twenty-fifth Congress in 1838, the Senate adopted rules granting floor privileges

Congress in 1638, the Senate adopted rules granting hoof privileges to representatives of the local newspapers in Washington.

Late in 1838 six out-of-town scribes petitioned for like privileges and, in January 1839, the Senate Committee on the Contingent Fund submitted a report recommending that the "front Seats in the eastern gallery be set aside for reporters."

James Gordon Bennett the elder, who had been a Washington correspondent for the New York Enquirer in 1827, as Bennett of the New York Herald, came to Washington in 1839 and remained until the termination of the Twenty-fifth Congress.

In 1841 Bennett engaged in a strenuous controversy with Senator Southard, the President pro tempore, who had denied Herald reporters the use of the Senate facilities. This controversy waged for several years, the so-called "letter writers," as correspondents were then known, being alternately aided and rebuffed.

In 1848 and in 1850 additional reporters and editors were granted floor privileges.

The records show that on March 24, 1856, in the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress, Senator John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, offered a resolution, which was adopted, which directed the Sergeant at Arms "to exclude all persons, except reporters, from the seats appropriated in the Senate gallery for the use of the reporters."

On February 11, 1858 (35th Cong., 1st sess.), a move to take care of reporters other than for the Congressional Globe was started. Then came the move to the new Chamber of the Senate—the present quarters.

The Senate Journal shows that a report from Mr. Davis from the committee appointed on the 23d of December previous to make arrangements was adopted on motion of Mr. Crittenden on January 4, 1859. In part it provided that:

"The center portion of the north gallery, being that within the rails, is reserved for such reporters of the press as may be admitted thereto by authority of the Senate, except the front desk, which is set apart for the reporters of the Senate."

which is set apart for the reporters of the Senate."

Meanwhile a Senate committee had been considering the Press Gallery situation since February 10, 1858. The resolution offered in the Senate on January 10, 1859, proposed keeping the front seats of the gallery for the reporters of the Globe. It was resolved, as adopted on January 11, 1859, "that the other seats in the reporters' gallery be numbered as directed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who, at the commencement of each Congress, may assign one seat to each newspaper in the city of Washington, and to such daily newspapers elsewhere as may apply therefor; but if any such newspapers have more than one reporter, they may alternate, occupying only the one seat assigned to such newspaper. "Seats in the reporters' gallery, however, shall not be assigned "Seats in the reporters' gallery, however, shall not be assigned to any person unless the Presiding Officer shall be satisfied that such person is a bona fide reporter of the particular paper, by whose editor or editors he shall be certified to be so employed. "Resolved, That the Presiding Officer is authorized to make, from time to time, such further regulations in regard hereto as may be deemed proper by him."

In the course of the discussions on these various proposals looking to the establishment of a press gallery, particularly in the immediate preceding years to 1859, that perhaps a Senate committee should be placed in charge instead of leaving the burden to the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

It is also history that the Senate on several occasions proceeded to the consideration of resolutions seeking the denial of gallery privileges to certain newspaper correspondents. It was on one of these occasions that James Gordon Bennet waxed eloquent and vitriolic and enlisted the support of Henry Clay.

The records of the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress for December 5 and 6, 1866, show that the Senate considered a proposal to afford accommodations to a press association representative on the floor of the Senate, but no action then resulted.

On March 12, 1873 (special session, 43d Cong.), Mr. Anthony offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

"Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Committee on Rules to make and enforce all rules and regulations respecting the reporters' gallery of the Senate and the occupation thereof, and such committee is directed to take such action from time to time as will confine the occupation of said gallery to bona fide reporters for daily newspapers, taking not to exceed one seat to each paper; and said committee shall have power to provide seat or seats on the floor for the Associated Press reporters and to regulate the occupation of the same.'

Mr. Anthony the next day moved to seek to prevent the issuance of more tickets to the Press Gallery than there were seats. "The object of the resolution is to protect the reporters in their gallery," he said in offering the suggestion, which went to the Rules Committee.

The Press Gallery then accommodated between 30 and 40. Washington Star of March 25, 1873, reported that 20 additional seats were to be added, "but the Committee on Rules, now having charge of the gallery, are determined that none but legitimate newspapermen employed by papers and having authority to repre-sent them shall be admitted to the gallery."

By this time it had become a custom to list the names of accredited members of the Press Galleries in the Congressional

Directory

From the splendid records relating to the history of the press in the Congress, compiled by James D. Preston, long the superin-tendent of the Senate Press Gallery, it is learned that on November 5, 1877, the Washington correspondents selected a committee to confer with Speaker Randall relative to the assignment of seats in the House reporters' gallery.

in the House reporters' gallery.

The Washington Star of Friday, April 4, 1879, reports that the correspondents met at the New York Times office "to adopt rules which had been prepared by the executive committee regulating admission to the reporters' galleries of the House and the Senate. They were adopted, are very stringent, and will have a tendency of keeping the galleries for their legitimate uses instead of being overrun by dead beats and lobbyists. The old executive committee of last year was reelected, consisting of Mr. George W. Adams, Gen. H. V. Boynton, E. B. Wight, L. Q. Washington, and William C. McBride."

By 1884 it was noted in an article that the most approach is the control of the cont

By 1884 it was noted in an article that the rules had been further strengthened by excluding from gallery membership those who were engaged in employment in the Government offices and Departments.

The first appearance of printed rules governing the Press Galleries came with the first session of the Fittieth Congress in December 1887. It was this action, approved by the Senate Rules Committee, then headed by Senator N. W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, and John G. Carlisle, then the Speaker of the House, that establishments. lished the official status of the standing committee of correspondents. The then standing committee consisted of Gen. H. V. Boynton, William C. McBride, E. B. Wright, F. A. G. Handy, and John M. The rules read as follows:

"(1) Persons desiring admission to the Press Gallery shall make application for tickets to the Committee on Rules of the Sanate, stating in writing for what paper or papers they are employed to report, and also stating that they are not engaged in the prosecution of claims pending before the Congress or the departments, and will not become so engaged while allowed admission to the gallery and that they are not in any sense the agents or representatives of persons or corporations having legislation before Congress, and will not become either while retaining their places in the gallery. Visiting journalists who may be allowed temporary admission to the gallery must conform to the restrictions of this

"(2) The application required by rule 1 shall be authenticated in a manner that shall be satisfactory to the standing committee of correspondents who shall see that the occupation of the gallery is confined to bona fide correspondents of reputable standing in their business

"(3) Clerks engaged in the executive departments of the Government, or persons engaged in other occupations whose chief support is not derived from newspaper correspondence, are not entitled to admission.

(4) Members of the families of correspondents are not entitled to admission.

"(5) The gallery subject to the supervision and control of the Committee on Rules, shall be under the direction of the standing committee of correspondents."

The Congressional Directory for the second session of the Fifty-first Congress in 1891 showed a change to rule 36 in the House, and the inclusion of this rule in the language of the original rules governing the Press Galleries.

This new promulgation was signed by Speaker Thomas B. Reed, and had the approval of the Senate Rules Committee, with Senator

Aldrich as chairman. In the current issue of the Congressional Directory the following rules governing the Press Galleries, which are the development and strengthening of these rules worked out more than a half a century ago, are the governing force over the Press Gallery mem-

"STANDING COMMITTEE OF CORRESPONDENTS."

In the intervening years down to 1939, there have been some modifications in the nature of strengthening clauses to these rules, and also changes due to the fact that the specific rules of both the House and Senate which control, had been given new numbers in the changes made in their rules by each of these

As was pointed out earlier in this memorandum, both branches of the Congress, the House and the Senate, have moved through the years to perfect arrangements whereby the daily press of the Nation should have facilities for reporting the proceedings. In the face of the inherent difficulties of a joint committee representing each body, the Standing Committee of Correspondents came into joint official recognition as the group to have the direction of the gallery and to sit in judgment on the qualification of applicants.

direction of the gallery and to sit in judgment on the qualification of applicants.

The House of Representatives handled the situation of providing facilities for the newspaper men, practically from the outset of the life of Congress. The records indicate that the newsmen were granted certain floor privileges at the discretion of the Speaker of the House. The Congressional Globe for February 17, 1846, reports that the reporters by a resolution were ordered to be furnished with one copy each of printed papers, documents, and bills, "as are laid on the desks of Members."

When the House of Representatives was preparing to move into the "new quarters" now occupied by that body, Mr. Warren, for a special committee in the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress on December 14, 1857, moved the following report, which was adopted:

"For the Official Reporters of the House, a convenient desk immediately under the Clerk's desk, is provided; and for the accommodation of the reporters of the public press, there is ample room in the gallery immediately over the Speaker's chair, and east of the railing. The committee recommends that this part of the gallery, the room immediately behind it, in the third story be set apart for their use, and provided with desks and conveniences for taking and writing out their notes. The telegraphic wires should also be introduced into this room, so as to permit the transmission of intelligence direct from the reporters to the distant press. By this means the report of an hour's speech might be completely set up in New York within 15 minutes after delivery." delivery delivery."

The Congressional Globe for December 16, 1857, reports a spirited debate over a resolution directing a study of the number of new employees needed in the enlarged congressional quarters, in which an amendment which was accepted directed the same committee to also report what facilities could be afforded "reporters not already provided for." It was explained that more than 50 news writers were seeking credentials to report congressional proceedings.

The Congressional Globe reporting House proceedings for Decem-

The Congressional Globe, reporting House proceedings for December 23, 1857, showed that the select committee headed by Mr. Faulkner submitted a four-point report and two rules, one of which, No. 17, dealt with those having floor privileges.

The report, which was adopted by the House, included the following:

"1. Resolved, That the Speaker assign portions of the galleries for the use of the press, for foreign ministers, and for a ladies' gallery.

"2. Resolved, That the south lobby and the east and west lobbies south of the principal staircases be reserved for the use of Members and persons admitted to the floor of the Hall.

"3. Resolved, That the superintendent cause the reporters' gallery to be properly fitted up with desks and seats and conveniences for writing and taking notes.

"4. Resolved, That the telegraph and reporters' room be reserved for the use of the telegraphic companies and reporters.

"Rule 18. Stenographers and reporters, other than the Official "Rule 18. Stenographers and reporters, other than the Official Reporters of the House, wishing to take down the debates may be admitted by the Speaker to the reporters' gallery over the Speaker's chair, but not on the floor of the House; but no person shall be allowed the privileges of said gallery under the character of stenographer or reporter without a written permission of the Speaker, specifying the part of the said gallery assigned to him; nor shall said stenographer or reporter be admitted to said gallery unless he shall state in writing for what paper or papers he is employed to report; nor shall he be admitted, or, if admitted, be suffered to retain his seat if he shall be, or become, an agent to prosecute any claim pending before Congress, and the Speaker shall give his written permission with this condition."

The then Speaker of the House was the Honorable James L. Orr, of South Carolina. In the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, Mr. Black burn, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Rules, reported the fol-lowing revision of the rules, which was adopted: "Rule 36, paragraph 2.

"Stenographers and reporters, other than the Official Reporters of the House wishing to take down debates and proceedings may be admitted by the Speaker to the reporters' gallery over the Speaker's chair under such regulations as he may from time to time pre-scribe; and he may assign two seats on the floor to Associated Press reporters and regulate the occupation of the same."

The Washington Star for Tuesday, March 9, 1880, contained the following item:

"The new House rules as interpreted by Doorkeeper Field greatly restricts the facilities hitherto extended to the press and limits the field of operations of the press to the corridors, which for the most part are occupied with telegraph instruments, peanut stands, tramps, pie women, and lobbyists."

During the tenure of Speaker of the House J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio, in the Forty-seventh Congress, there were numerous conflicts over the invasion of the Press Gallery by outsiders and persons to whom cards had been issued who were not newspapermen. It was during this period that the enlarging corps of Washington correspondents set up their own representative committee, which proposed even more stringent qualification rules. The application of these rules applied first to the Senate Press Gallery, and soon after John G. Carlisle became Speaker of the House were approved by him. Subsequently, as noted elsewhere in this memorandum, the "Rules governing the Press Gallery" received their initial joint endorsement at the hands of both branches of the Congress, and the standing committee of correspondents came officially into existence.

In the early days there were few correspondents. Down through the years the number of daily newspapers requiring correspondents in Washington has increased tremendously. The major portion of this increase began about 1912.

At the present time there are 513 accredited members of the congressional Press Galleries, almost 50 having been here approximately a quarter of a century. The number of newspapers represented now aggregates 315.

The Congress has always been alive to the necessity of providing facilities for this vast working force. But the actual "gal-lery" accommodations in both the Senate and the House have lery" accommodations in both the Senate and the House have long since passed the point where the number of seats available is adequate. It has become necessary for the standing committee to restrict on important occasions, such as a Presidential appearance at a joint session, the number of persons actually admitted to the gallery space, allotting one seat to each newspaper, and two or three each to the press associations which serve many hundred newspapers.

In the matter of work space for each of the galleries, much has been done by both branches of the Congress. The inability, however, to obtain additional room space on the House side, has however, to obtain additional room space on the House side, has resulted in a compact jamming together of facilities there, which from the work-load point, make the situation a distressing one.

The Senate several years ago authorized and made extensive and substantial extensions to the outside Press Gallery facilities, which make working conditions there much more favorable than those existing on the House side. But here, too, there is no lost space, and no room can be spared for facilities, which numerous working correspondents have requested.

working correspondents have requested.

The record of the control by the Standing Committee of Correspondents over admissions to the Press Galleries, and the conduct of members is an enviable one. There is an appeal from a decision of the committee to the Speaker of the House and to the Rules Committee of the Senate. Such appeals have been taken, but there are few if any instances where the ruling of the standing committee has been overturned.

It is not without significance that the two major political parties, the Republican in 1904, and the Democratic in 1912 national organizations, have for many years now, turned over to the Standing Committee of Correspondents on the occasion of the great national conventions to pick President and Vice Presidential nominees, the complete control over the press stands, including the distribution of press credentials to the newspapers of the country, and the arrangements of press facilities at the convention halls. convention halls.

As the activities of the Federal Government have enlarged the

As the activities of the Federal Government have enlarged the list of accredited members of the Press Galleries, as it appears in the Congressional Directory, has served the important purpose of making readily available to all officials a listing of accredited and responsible newspaper writers in Washington.

Here, too, the standing committee of correspondents, due to the status that it has attained through the years, performs an extremely useful service. There are many newspaper writers in Washington who are not members of the Press Galleries. There are many reasons for this. The standing committee has been prompt to move to expunge from its listings individuals who have broached the proprieties.

It is also a fact worthy of consideration that the five members of

It is also a fact worthy of consideration that the five members of the standing committee, elected to serve in that capacity for the duration of a Congress of the United States, are chosen at large from the entire body of accredited members of the Press Galleries. The post is esteemed as one of journalistic honor and distinction, and many noted Washington correspondents have served on the committee

It might be pointed out that the present committee for the Seventy-sixth Congress was elected from a field of 10 candidates, and that more than 300 Washington correspondents cast their votes

The Press Galleries are distinctly a daily press institution. It has obviously been the congressional thought that they should be so continued and maintained. To inject any other element into the situation involving them would hamper and disturb what has become an efficient and sure-moving operation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. May I state that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana is making a most interesting and informative address, as he always does. May I add that I am sure that it is a source of much satisfaction to the gentleman from Indiana that the House Press Gallery is crowded with the gentlemen of the press.

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman. I am also very much gratified to observe that I have a very select audience facing me. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have asked the indulgence of the House at this late hour to join my colleague from Indiana in expressing my own very deep appreciation for the gentlemen of the press. It has been my good fortune to meet many of the fellows in the Press Gallery. and I have found them to be high-class, honorable gentlemen. It has been my experience that one can talk to the average reporter freely, frankly, and fully at all times "on" or "off" the record, and that they are honorable and dependable under any and all circumstances. [Applause.]

Now, just a word with reference to the gentleman from Indiana who has just addressed the House. I have served with the gentleman from Indiana for several years and have also visited his home city of Indianapolis on many occasions. I was delighted to learn that he is loved and really appreciated by his home folk, who know him best. May I add that until I had served with him on the Appropriations Committee, I did not fully appreciate his unusual ability and untiring and unselfish efforts to serve his people.

May I add that I am certain I express the sentiment of every Member of this House when I say that, irrespective of party affiliations, no man on either side of this aisle enjoys a greater respect of his colleagues than does the able gentleman from Indiana. [Applause.]

It is my sincere hope that he remains at his post of duty as chairman of a powerful and important subcommittee on appropriations for many years to come. America needs more men of the high caliber and sincerity of purpose of the gentleman from Indiana in public service. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. I want, from the fullness of my heart, to express my thanks to my friend from Oklahoma. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, supplementing the interesting remarks by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW | concerning the evolution of the Press Galleries in the Congress for newspaper reporters and correspondents. it may be worth while to recall to the House the action recently recommended by your Committee on Rules and approved by the House, to provide facilities and accommodations for those other disseminators of prompt information to the public concerning the debates and proceedings of the House. I refer to the radio reporters who employ, not accounts printed in newspapers but oral news bulletins broadcast by wireless through the ether.

AGITATION FOR PROVISION OF FACILITIES FOR RADIO REPORTERS

With the invention and rapid development of radio, which was not even dreamed of until long after the time when the Press Galleries were fully established—and with the ever-increasing dissemination of oral news bulletins through the ether, there has arisen a demand for the furnishing of facilities for the prompt gathering of news of the debates and other proceedings in the Congress by reporters who broadcast such news by wireless. Full hearings, earlier this present session, were had by the Committees on Rules of the House and of the Senate on the application by certain "radio reporters" to have extended to them facilities and accommodations similar to those long since provided for reporters and correspondents for daily newspapers.

Rule XXXV of the Rules of the House of Representatives, first adopted in 1857, had been amended from time to time as occasion demanded, including February 18, 1909; April 5, 1911; January 18, 1916; and December 13, 1916. Until its most recent amendment, it read, in full, as follows:

1. The appointment and removal, for cause, of the official reporters of the House, including stenographers of committees, and the manner of the execution of their duties shall be vested in the

2. Such portion of the gallery over the Speaker's chair as may be necessary to accommodate representatives of the press wish-ing to report debates and proceedings shall be set aside for their use, and reputable reporters and correspondents shall be admitted use, and reputable reporters and correspondents shall be admitted thereto under such regulations as the Speaker may from time to time prescribe; and the supervision of such gallery, including the designation of its employees, shall be vested in the standing committee of correspondents, subject to the direction and control of the Speaker; and the Speaker may assign one seat on the floor to Associated Press reporters, one to the Sun Press Association, one to the United Press Association, one to the National News Association, one to the New York Herald Syndicate, and regulate the occupation of the same. And the Speaker may admit to the floor, under such of the same. And the Speaker may admit to the floor, under such regulations as he may prescribe, one additional representative of each press association.

Because of the present crowded condition of the Press Gallery in the House and certain other considerations, it was decided by the Committee on Rules of the House that it would not be practicable to provide accommodations for radio reporters in the present Press Gallery immediately over the Speaker's chair. Therefore it seemed necessary to provide space elsewhere in the galleries of the House for the accommodation of reporters for this new form of news dissemination. Furthermore, it seemed desirable to have radio reporters organize a self-governing committee, similar to the standing committee of correspondents for newspapers, who should be responsible for the control of admissions to this gallery for radio reporters and the conduct of persons admitted thereto, subject always to the direction and control of the Speaker. After investigation by the Rules Committee and consultation with the Speaker and the Architect of the Capitol, it was determined that a limited number of seats could be provided for radio reporters in the south gallery of the hall of the House, to the east of the press section; and other facilities in the adjacent east corridor on the gallery floor, between the two public elevators.

ACCOMMODATIONS IN HOUSE GALLERY FOR RADIO REPORTERS, AUTHORIZED BY HOUSE RESOLUTION 169, ADOPTED APRIL 20, 1939

Accordingly, House Resolution 169, introduced by Mr. DEMPSEY, of New Mexico, was reported by the Committee on Rules, and, on April 20, 1939, was adopted unanimously by the House. This resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That rule XXXV of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by the addition of the following, which shall become paragraph 3:

"3. Such portion of the gallery of the House of Representatives as may be necessary to accommodate reporters of news to be disseminated by radio, wireless, and similar means of transmission, wishing to report debates and proceedings, shall be set aside for their use, and reputable reporters thus engaged shall be admitted thereto under such regulations as the Speaker may from time to time prescribe; and the supervision of such gallery, including the designation of its employees, shall be vested in the standing com-mittee of radio reporters, subject to the direction and control of the Speaker."

THE SENATE, BY SENATE RESOLUTION 117, ADOPTED APRIL 25, 1939, AUTHORIZED ITS COMMITTEE ON RULES TO MAKE REGULATIONS EXTENDING THE USE OF REPORTERS' GALLERIES OF THE SENATE TO RADIO REPORTERS

As appears from the Congressional Record, the Committee on Rules of the Senate also considered recently the application of certain radio reporters to be admitted to the reporters' galleries of the Senate.

Paragraph 2 of rule XXXIV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, until its recent amendment, provided as follows:

2. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Rules to make all rules and regulations respecting such parts of the Capitol, its passages, and galleries, including the restaurant and Senate Office Building, as are or may be set apart for the use of the Senate and officer. They shall, at the opening of each session of Congress, make such regulations respecting the reporters' gallery of the Senate and will confine its occupation to bona fide reporters for daily newspapers essigning but to exceed our session in the confine its occupation. papers, assigning not to exceed one seat to each paper.

Senator Gillette, of Iowa, on April 6, 1939, introduced Senate Resolution 117, which, after consideration by the Committee on Rules, was reported on behalf of that committee by Senator NEELY, of West Virginia, accompanied by Report No. 317. In this report was embodied an interesting memorandum by Mr. Paul J. McGahan, Washington correspondent for the Philadelphia Inquirer and a member of the standing committee of correspondents for the Seventy-fourth, Seventyfifth, and Seventy-sixth Congresses. In this memorandum Mr. McGahan told the little-known story of the evolution of the press galleries, of the self-governing body of newspaper men known as the standing committee of correspondents and of the rigid rules formulated and enforced by that committee concerning admissions to the Press Galleries and the conduct of members thereof:

After debate, the Senate, on April 25, 1939, adopted Senate Resolution 117, which is as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph 2 of rule XXXIV of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the last sentence of said paragraph 2 and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "They paragraph 2 and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "They shall make such regulations respecting the reporters' galleries of the Senate, together with the adjoining rooms and facilities, as will confine their occupancy and use to bona fide reporters for daily newspapers, to bona fide reporters of news or press associations requiring telegraph service to their membership, and to bona fide reporters for daily news dissemination through radio, wire, wireless, and similar media of transmission. These regulations shall so provide for the use of such space and facilities as fairly to distribute their use to all such media of news dissemination." their use to all such media of news dissemination."

It thus appears that the Senate, as well as the House, has recently taken steps to provide for the accommodation of radio reporters' facilities similar to those long since provided for newspaper reporters and correspondents.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JUNE 6, 1939

(Legislative day of Monday, June 5, 1939)

The Chaplain, Rev. Z^QBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whose wondrous name is Love, subdue the sanctities of our worship with such reverence toward Thee that our voice of prayer and praise, yea, even the deeper silence out of which this voice is born, may thrill in us with ecstasy and spiritual delight as we are taken to that border line where for a moment the inquiring intellect is hushed, the urgent will held captive, and only heavenly emotion is awake. Inspired by this reverence learned at Thy feet, O God, open our eyes to the dignity of Thy humblest child and change our outlook on a needy world, that pity may give place to a new and high resolve to secure for our brethren everywhere the glowing opportunities to which, as sons of God, they are entitled. Give to each one of us the courage, the superb daring which does its God-appointed task and leaves with Thee the consequences. Help us to remember that the only security worth coveting in this world is the security of the man who is ever ready and willing to endure and to risk everything in order that love may reign in the hearts of men through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. Barkley, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Monday, June 5, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

UNVEILING OF WILL ROGERS STATUE

The ceremonies in connection with the unveiling and presentation of the statue will take place in the rotunda of the Capitol today, beginning at 3 p. m. The statue will be presented to the Government by the Governor of Oklahoma, Hon. Leon C. Phillips; and the statue will be received on behalf of the Government by Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, United States Senator from Kentucky.

On behalf of the Oklahoma Will Rogers Memorial Commission. I extend to the Members of the Senate an invitation to attend the ceremonies.

THE WILL ROGERS MEMORIAL COMMISSION

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Hon. Jesse H. Jones to Dr. Bizzell, president of the University of Oklahoma. Today there will be unveiled the monument to Will Rogers. letter tells of a living monument that is being established by the Will Rogers Memorial Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WILL ROGERS MEMORIAL COMMISSION,

New York, N. Y., May 22, 1939.

Dear Dr. Bizzell: I beg to hand you herewith:

(1) A check drawn on the Marine Midland Trust Co. of New York, in amount of $76,620.67, payable to the University of Oklahoma

(2) A duly executed contract between the Will Rogers Memorial (2) A duly executed contract between the Will Rogers Memorial Commission and the University of Oklahoma. The contract is signed by you as president of the University of Oklahoma, and by Owen D. Young, vice president of the Will Rogers Memorial Commission. It has been approved by myself as treasurer of the Will Rogers Memorial Commission, and by Gen. Roy Hoffman, chairman of the Will Rogers Memorial Commission of the State of Oklahoma.

The contract sets out in general terms the purpose for which the money is to be used, though in its preparation effort was made to give the regents such latitude in the administration of the fund as may be necessary in meeting changing conditions. This check, together with $25,000 heretofore given to the Murrow Indian Orphan Home at Muskogee by direction of the Will Rogers Memorial Commission of Oklahoma, and $23,379.33 for use in connection with the Will Rogers Memorial Museum at Claremore, makes a total of $125,000 to Oklahoma, of the funds contributed by hundreds of the transfer of the trans makes a total of $125,000 to Oklahoma, of the funds contributed by hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country for the purpose of creating a lasting memorial to Will Rogers; $125,000 is being intrusted to the University of California for administration, and $60,000 to the University of Texas.

The purpose of the commission is to create living memorials to Will Rogers in perpetuity. State universities were chosen as the most appropriate agencies to administer the funds because they are non-sectarian, representative of all the people, and will endure. The Universities of Oklahoma, Texas, and California were selected because Will was closely identified with these States.

Monuments and memorials are usually erected to men who distinguish themselves as statesmen or soldiers. Few are erected Monuments and memorials are usually erected to men who distinguish themselves as statesmen or soldiers. Few are erected to private citizens, but actually Will Rogers could hardly be regarded a private citizen. He belonged to the world by acclamation, and there probably has never been as spontaneous a demand to honor a passing citizen as was true immediately following the accident that took Will Rogers from us. The world was saddened when the news of that accident was flashed from Point Barrow. We miss Will Rogers as we miss no other man. He gave us a bit of homely philosophy every day, a prod to remind us that we should not take things too seriously. I wish we had him with us today to give us those daily bits of philosophy; we need them. His was a mission ordained from on high, and the world is better because of what he gave us.

I have said that our purpose in establishing this fund is to create a living memorial to Will Rogers in perpetuity. I appreciate that "in perpetuity" means a very long time. We believe the world will be better if we can perpetuate his life and spirit. We have not had another such character as Will Rogers. Wherever he went he was immediately recognized, and crowds would gather about him in admiration and affection. All loved him. He gave something of himself—good cheer—to all with whom he came in contact. He could make all the world laugh and forget its troubles.

Will Rogers had an extraordinary knowledge of human nature, a wholesome sense of humor for all humanity, and a common-sense wisdom that went to the heart of a problem. He was as ruggedly simple and unaffected in manner as he was at heart, yet he was as much at ease with Presidents or Kings as with the humblest citizen. Will Rogers was a peace-loving man, and has been widely quoted as saying that he never met a man he did not like. He was one of the great philosophers of our generation.

It has been a labor of love to have had the privilege of assisting in establishing this memorial to Will Rogers, and it is fitting in every way that the University of Oklahoma should administer an important part of it. I would like to see the fund augmented by further gifts from people interested in helping underprivileged boys and girls to prepare themselves for life without depending upon charity.

Sincerely yours.

Sincerely yours,

JESSE H. JONES, Treasurer, Will Rogers Memorial Commission.

Hon. WILLIAM BIZZELL,
President, the University of Oklahoma, Norman, Okla.

The correspondence presented by Mr. Wagner is as follows:

JUNE 5, 1939.

My Dear Secretary Wallace: For some time the United States Housing Authority has been giving serious consideration to the extension of its program more largely to small communities and rural areas. We have never subscribed to the principle that slum conditions and the ill-housed are phenomena existing only in urban areas. Surveys of housing conditions in rural areas, particularly among farm groups and migratory workers, have conclusively demonstrated that many such families of low income are compelled to live under unsafe and insanitary housing conditions which are injurious to the health, safety, and morals of the Nation. These families are part of the responsibility the U.S. H. A. was created to meet.

created to meet.

From the very beginning of our program the U. S. H. A. has taken an active interest in the extension of its program to small communities and rural areas. We have already made substantial progress in carrying the U. S. H. A. program to small communities. For example, loan contracts have been approved for cities like Frankfort, Ky., with a population of about 10,000; Sarasota, Fla., with a population of 8,000; and Mount Hope, W. Va., with a population of 2,300. However, the extension of our program to strictly rural areas and isolated farm groups has presented a number of special problems requiring special and extensive consideration. Very few States had enacted housing laws permitting the creation of public agencies which embraced rural areas. The U. S. H. A. of public agencies which embraced rural areas. The U.S. H. A. has consistently encouraged the enactment of such State legislation which would enable public agencies to undertake rural housing programs. Of the 38 States which have enacted public-housing legislation, 17 now provide for the creation of State or county housing authorities which are empowered to function in rural areas.

Realizing that the problem of rural housing is very closely related to the entire farm economy, we have sought the advice and guidance of the Department of Agriculture in the consideration of a program of rural housing. As you know, my representatives and yours have consulted on this matter as an interdepartmental committee with a view to ascertaining what action should be taken at this time to facilitate the development of a housing program for farm families of low incomes. This committee has recommended that the United States Housing Act of 1937 be amended to add a new title dealing with the subject of rural housing. This amendment (a copy of which is attached) would direct the undertaking and development of a comprehensive program for the assistance of public-housing agencies in the development of rural housing of public-housing agencies in the development of rural housing for farm families of low income and would authorize the U.S. H. A. and the Department of Agriculture to work in cooperation in the development of this housing program. The provisions of title I of the act would be made applicable to the proposed rural housing program.

I have very carefully considered the recommendations of this committee and wholeheartedly endorse the proposed amendment. Under this amendment I feel that it will be possible for the U.S. H. A., with the cooperation of and advice of the Department of Agriculture, to make further detailed studies and to formulate the plans which will assure that U. S. H. A. assisted housing can be provided very substantially in rural areas.

I am interested in learning your views regarding this proposed amendment and hope that you will feel free to transmit them

Faithfully yours.

NATHAN STRAUS, Administrator.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

JUNE 6, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. STRAUS: I have you letter inquiring as to my views regarding the problem of providing decent housing for farm families of low income. I am fully in agreement with you regarding the seriousness of this problem and the urgent need for action to relieve the plight of the ill-housed farmer. Too often people assume that all farmers are living under conditions conducive to good health and well-being. Actually many low-income farm families are living under the problem. are living under the most deplorable and unhealthful conditions, are living under the most deplorable and unhealthful condutions, and no private or Government program has yet been able to reach the lowest-income farm families living under these conditions. While various agencies in the Department of Agriculture have been engaged in the program of improving housing conditions in rural areas, these agencies are not able to serve the lowest-income farm groups living under the worst housing conditions.

It is for these reasons that I would welcome the extension of the U.S. H. A. program to the rural-housing field. I am glad that you appreciate the very close relationship between the entire farm economy and the problem of rehousing the low-income farmer. In my judgment, the proposed program of rural housing can only be effectively carried out through cooperation between your agency and the Department of Agriculture. The whole problem of housing in rural areas is one which requires special treatment because the sources, amounts, and stability of farm income present such different problems from those involved in an urban housing program. The cooperation of the Department of Agriculture and the U.S. H. A. would make it possible to bring to this problem the housing experience of your agency and the agricultural experience of this Department. of this Department

I have been following very closely the work of our interdepartmental committee on rural housing. In my opinion, the proposed amendment to the United States Housing Act is highly desirable. Under it a comprehensive program could be developed and undertaken to assist public-housing agencies in the development of housing projects for families of low income in rural areas. I hope that this amendment is adopted so that we may commence an attack upon the much-neglected problem of the ill-housed farm family.

farm family.

Very sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE Secretary of Agriculture.

Hon. NATHAN STRAUS Administrator, United States Housing Authority, Washington, D. C.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton] is absent because of a slight illness.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Brown], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SCHWARTZ] are detained on important public business.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Bridges] is absent because of an operation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Chair thinks he had better state that the pending bill has been reported by the committee with one amendment in the nature of a substitute. Under the precedents set by the Senate that amendment will be considered as an original bill, and any amendment to that is subject to an amendment without being in the third degree.

Mr. TYDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. DAVIS, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the pending bill and the amendment, but I am glad to yield temporarily to other Senators for routine matters.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ELLENDER. When the Senate took a recess last evening I think the Record will show that I had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wants to state, once and for all, that the right of recognition by the Chair cannot be taken away; it makes no difference who had the floor, although, if there was a moral obligation or a gentlemen's understanding, undoubtedly the Chair would keep it. The Chair did not observe that the Senator from Louisiana had the floor or that he desired the floor.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have been standing here ever since the roll was called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has at present recognized the Senator from Maryland, whether his position is correct or is not correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he can give me an idea as to about how long he desires to hold the floor?

Mr. ELLENDER. Not in excess of 15 or 20 minutes; of course, depending on questions that may be asked.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator that I should like to give way, and have him speak first, except for the fact that I have made about 20 appointments this morning to see people in my office, and I have other appointments beginning at 1:30. I want to speak on this matter; and in view of the situation, I have indicated I cannot well defer what I should like to say.

(At this point Mr. Tydings yielded to several Senators to present routine matters, which appear under the appropriate headings elsewhere in today's Record.)

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on March 8 last I made a number of observations concerning the conduct of the United States Housing Authority in administering the Slum Clearance Act. Since that time I have had numerous conferences with representatives of the Authority, and have asked them many questions, and have tried to study in great detail the report which they have issued covering the first activities of that agency.

I do not think what I am going to say today will have the slightest effect; I do not believe many Senators will bother to look into the facts; I do not believe they will be swayed by the facts; but I do believe the day will come, at some time in the future, when what I am saying today will be generally debated by both sides of this body.

The slum-clearance program is an appealing program, because it has a splendid name. Who is not in favor of slum clearance? Everybody in America is in favor of it. What is the plan by which slum clearance is to be effectuated? It is my belief that not many Members of the Congress know what the plan is, even those who have served on the committee, because, from reading the law, it is impossible to tell what the plan is. The law gives the Administrator certain general powers, but how he is employing those powers very few Senators know, because it is impossible to know unless one digs into the figures, and supplements his researches by a great many questions.

Let me briefly try to outline the plan; but before I do so I desire to make one general observation, that the United States Housing Administrator is now making contracts in the name of the United States Government with the cities and towns of America to eliminate slums, and to build, in place of the slum houses, modern apartment dwellings. The theory of the law is that 10 percent of the tentative cost of the program is to be put up by the municipality. The other 90 percent is to be loaned to the municipality by the United States Housing Authority; and the theory, of course, is that the city will repay to the United States Housing Authority the 90 percent of the cost of the project which in the first instance the Authority lends to the city. That is what every Senator and, perhaps, every Member of the House thinks is going on; but that is not what is going on. The Federal Government is giving to the cities of America the 90 percent; indeed, I shall prove, by facts and figures, that the Federal Government is giving to the cities of America 100 percent of the cost of each one of these projects, and that the cities of America are not paying back to the Federal Treasury a thin dime as a part of the cost of the slum-clearance

How can I substantiate that statement? Briefly, I shall substantiate it by an illustration. First of all, when the city wants to build a million-dollar housing program, it theoretically puts up and actually puts up, in one way or another, $100,000. The Federal Government then puts up $900,000 in the form of a so-called loan; and the $900,000, plus the $100,000, make the million dollars with which the project is to be constructed. But at the same time that the United States Housing Authority lends this money to the cities of America—namely, $900,000 in the illustration I am using—it makes a contract with the city wherein it agrees to give to the city each year for 60 years a rent subsidy of a certain amount; and in every case the amount of money which the United States Housing Authority agrees to pay the city annually as a subsidy is sufficient to enable the city to give back to the United States Housing Authority and thus to liquidate its proportionate part of the loan for that year, and the city has sufficient left over to liquidate the 10 percent which it originally put up.

Do I make that clear? The United States Housing Authority agrees in formal contracts, under the powers given it in the law, to give to the cities of America each year for 60 years a definite sum of money. That annual subsidy is sufficient to pay off the entire loan of 90 percent which the city owes the Federal Government, and the city has sufficient left over out of the annual subsidy to pay off the 10 percent which the city first put up. In other words, in the end Baltimore, San Francisco, New York, Havre de Grace, or whatever the town may be, gets from the Treasury of the United States the whole 100 percent of the slum-clearance cost.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I wish to make an inquiry for information. My understanding is that there is some requirement in the act that the subsidy will in effect be passed along to the tenants by a reduction in the rent. Is there not something of that kind in the act?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Will not the effect of that be to nullify the argument of the Senator?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; because the tenant's rent does not come to the United States Treasury. I am dealing now with who pays for the slum-clearance project, in whole or in part; and I have proved, by the statement I have made, that the Federal Government is providing 100 percent of the cost.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. My understanding of the Senator's argument is that he is contending that the cities will take the subsidy and use it for the purpose of making their repayments to the Federal Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. But if the law requires that the subsidy money shall be used for the purpose of a reduction in rents, how is that possible?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is easily possible for this reason: The city does not have to charge the tenant anything at all for capital outlay, because all of that money has been furnished. If I give the Senator an office building which costs $1,000,000, so that he has not one penny invested in it, he does not have to figure as a part of the rents he charges, whatever they may be, the liquidation of the capital outlay necessary to erect the building.

While the tenants may pay lower rents, as the matter stands the office building has not cost the Senator from Washington a penny; and, as the matter stands, it has not cost any of the cities of America a penny to build these slumclearance projects, because the United States agrees to give the cities every year a sum of money sufficient to pay back the 90 percent of the original cost which the Government advanced in the form of a loan at the start of the building of the project, plus another sum sufficient to liquidate the 10 percent which the city was supposed to put up in the first instance. That is the plain truth, and nobody in the Housing Authority and nobody out of the Housing Authority can deny it.

We are building these slum-clearance projects entirely out of the Federal Treasury. The only contribution which the cities of America make is in the form of the remission, in whole or in part, of the taxes which the tenants of the houses would have to pay if they were privately owned. That is all there is to this whole program. It is not slum-clearance at all; it is state socialism. We are now getting ready to build homes for over a million families, paid for entirely out of the Treasury of the United States, without a dime being contributed by any locality in which one of the projects is being erected.

One may go around and look at the homes. They are very fine; they are very impressive; and, without knowing the mechanics of how they are constructed, one is apt to say,

"Is it not a splendid thing? What a great country this is, to provide homes like that for those who now do not have such fine homes." But, Mr. President, these homes are being built entirely by the Government of the United States; and it took me almost a month, in face-to-face conferences, when I kept sticking to the facts, to get this admission from the representatives of the United States Housing Authority. They used the argument that the Senator from Washington has used: "But do not the tenants get low rents?" I said, "Of course they get low rents. If the city gets the building for nothing, it does not have to include in the rents of the tenants any part of the liquidation of the original capital."

Finally they said, "Senator, that is true." I said, "Why did you not tell me that a month ago?" I propounded to them over 300 written questions in order to elicit these facts, and I have never seen a more evasive agency in its reluctance to tell the real mechanics of this plan as I have found to be the case with the United States Housing Authority.

Then when I spoke on March 18-and I am not on the committee-and presented the same figures I am presenting now, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who is very much interested in this program, took the floor and stated that my figures were wrong, that if I would look into the United States Housing Authority's annual report I would find that I had not drawn the right conclusion.

I could not answer that suggestion then because I had not seen the report. I immediately tried to get a copy of the report, but there were only two copies of it, and one was in the Government Printing Office. It took me 6 weeks to force out of the Government Printing Office a copy of that report so that I could read it. When I got the report, lo, I found it was the same as the original report from which I had quoted, with the single exception that the sum of $27,000,000 of the original outlay for the 140 apartment houses had been removed from the cost because that was the sum needed to demolish the old buildings, and they said that ought not to be figured as a part of the cost of the project in their calculation. Otherwise, the same figures which I had found in the preliminary report were contained in the summary in the annual report.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WAGNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield. Mr. DOWNEY. Will not the Senator advise me as to the source, particularly as to whether it is borrowed money or money raised by taxation, from which will be secured the funds for financing these operations?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I intend to present an illustration which I have worked out showing what happens to a million-dollar project. This is how the United States Housing Authority operates: Let us take a slum-clearance project which costs a million dollars entire. The law requires that the city wherein the project is located must put up 10 percent of the cost. Ten percent of a million dollars is $100,000, which the city must advance toward the cost of the The other 90 percent, or $900,000, is loaned by the United States Housing Authority to the city.

The city is supposed to pay off the $900,000 in 60 years, and the United States Housing Authority requires the city to make an annual payment of 3.6133 percent of the amount loaned over a 60-year period. But the United States Housing Authority gives to the city an annual subsidy of 3.5 percent of the total cost of the project. If we take 3.6133 percent of $900,000, the amount the United States Housing Authority loans to the city, we find it aggregates $32,519.70. That would be the amount of annual payment required of the city to repay the interest and principal of the $900,000 loan originally made to the city by the United States Housing Authority.

If, however, we take 3.5 percent of a million dollars, we find the figure to be $35,000 a year, and that is the amount of the annual subsidy which the United States Housing Authority gives the city. Consequently, when the city borrows the $900,000 it agrees, by contract, to pay the United States

Housing Authority $32,519.70 a year, but the United States Housing Authority agrees to give to the city in an annual subsidy $35,000 a year. Thus we see that the United States Housing Authority, which is the National Government, pays to the city each year in subsidy more than the city is required to pay to the United States Housing Authority to pay off its loan. Have I made that clear? Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. DOWNEY. Not entirely. What I wanted was information as to the original source of the money. From what allocation of the Government does the money come?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad the Senator asked that ques-

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to that point, may I ask him a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly. Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, the subsidy does not go directly to the city, except that it goes through the city, but it really goes to the tenants, does it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; as I shall show. That is what one will be told, but all the city is interested in is how much it is getting a year, and how much it has to pay a year. If the city gets the building, as it does, without putting up a single dollar of the cost of construction, as I have proved by these figures, it obviously can charge the tenants just enough in the way of rent to keep the building in repair, and insure it, and operate it, because the money to liquidate the milliondollar cost of the building comes each year from the Federal Government. Therefore, there is no doubt in the world that the rents are lower. If I should give any man here a building for nothing, in fixing the rental he would not have to charge as part of the rent an amount sufficient to amortize the cost of the building over a period of years. But the truth is that the Federal Government is paying every single cent of the cost of every one of these buildings in every city and town in the country over a 60-year period.

I yield for any question from any Senator who disputes that statement, because that is the nubbin of the whole argument.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Who pays back the 10 percent that is borrowed by the Authority from local sources?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Government of the United States, because the Government of the United States, in a milliondollar transaction, pays to the city $35,000 a year, 31/2 percent of a million. The city is obligated to pay to the United States Government 3.6133 percent of $900,000, which is $32,519.70. Therefore, the Federal Government pays to the city a little more than $2,000 a year more than the city is required to pay to the Federal Government to liquidate its loan, and that is sufficient, over a 60-year period, to liquidate the 10 percent which the city was supposed to put up in the first instance.

Mr. ELLENDER. As a matter of fact, the act specifically provides that 10 percent of the cost of a project must be provided by the local authority from local investors. In other words, the cash must be actually put up.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct. Mr. ELLENDER. It is borrowed by the local authority.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. And paid back by the local authority.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. After the 10-percent contribution is put up in cash by the local authority from funds obtained locally, then the contract is signed and the U.S. H. A. agrees to loan 90 percent of the cost of the project.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has stated the facts correctly, but I submit he draws a false conclusion from those facts. Of course, at the start the city puts up the $100,000, in the case I have suggested, but the law provides that the United States Housing Authority may enter into a contract with the city to pay a subsidy each year for a period of 60 years, and the subsidy, as I have proved by their own figures, is enough not only to liquidate the 90 percent of the loan of the Federal Government to the city in the first instance but the 10 percent which the city advanced at the time the building was under construction.

Mr. ELLENDER. What about the amount which the city itself donates through a remission of taxes? As I understand, the cities contribute a sum averaging about 50 percent of the amount the Federal Government contributes in the form of annual subsidies. The cities contribute said sum, although the law requires only that they put up not less than 20 percent of the sum contributed by the Federal Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. First of all, in the illustration I have taken, and to which I am sticking merely because it is a simple illustration, the city in the end gets the building for nothing. The city has not a dollar invested in it. At the end of the 60-year period the building comes to the city for nothing. Its entire cost is paid by the Federal Government over a 60-year period, at a percentage which will return to the city 100 percent of the cost of the building. Therefore the city does not have to charge, as a part of its yearly rental, any figure for interest or amortization of cost of the building. Having to charge only sufficient to pay for services, repairs, insurance, and the like, obviously it can take about half the rent off, because the city, having no investment in the building itself, is concerned only with obtaining sufficient rental to liquidate its annual expenses. Is that plain?

Mr. ELLENDER. No. Your conclusions are reached by assuming a false premise.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mary-

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish with the Senator from Louisiana; then I will be delighted to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. ELLENDER. There is something else the Senator from Maryland overlooked, namely, the savings on interest. The money is loaned to the local housing authority at a rate fixed in the statute, which is one-half percent in excess of the Federal going rate of interest. Money has been borrowed by the Housing Authority at 1% percent and afterward loaned to local authorities at 3 percent and in some instances 31/4 percent. The U.S. H. A. has shown a profit on the bonds so far issued, and if all bonds authorized under the 1937 act and those herein authorized were sold under like terms, a profit of $20,000,000 per year would be made on the transaction, thereby reducing the subsidy payments from a total of $73,000,000 to $53,000,000, all of which I propose to further discuss on my own time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator finished? Mr. ELLENDER. I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is accurate in saying that the Federal Housing Authority is borrowing money from the Federal Treasury at a lower rate than it is lending it to the city. That is true; and on that particular transaction the Government makes a profit on the interest. But the Senator must not lose sight of the fact that what I have said about the cost of the building is true; and, before coming to the question of interest, I wanted to ascertain whether or not the Senator wished to take issue with me concerning the figures I have presented to the Senate. If he has finished with that matter—and he has not disproved any statement I have made-I will debate with him next the question of interest, for that is the next subject on my memorandum.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I think the question of interest rates must be considered in connection with the argument which the Senator is now making. The Senator contends that the entire project will be paid for by the Federal Government. The Senator from Maryland bases his argument on what? On the fact that the amount of money that the Federal Treasury advances each year to the Housing Authority for subsidies will be sufficient to service the entire cost of the project. The subsidy payments on all projects now under contract and those to be built under this bill will be $73,000,000, and the savings on the interest will amount to $20,000,000. The question I should like to have answered by the Senator from Maryland is, Will $53,000,000 be sufficient to pay all the interest and the principal of this entire debt over a period of 60 years?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me ask the Senator a question, and then we will have struck an issue. Will the Senator concede that, if the United States Housing Authority pays the same rate to borrow money that it charges the cities on the money it lends to them, my original proposition is an accurate one?

Mr. ELLENDER. If the service charge-

Mr. TYDINGS. No, Mr. President-

Mr. ELLENDER. If 31/2 percent would service the interest charge and the principal on all the loans, I will answer the Senator's question in the affirmative. But what about the savings on interest charges of $20,000,000 per year, which would reduce the subsidies from seventy-three to fifty-three million dollars?

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well. Then we have made some headway. We are now down to the interest. The Senator from Louisiana has stated that if the United States Housing Authority paid the same rate of interest to get money from the Federal Treasury that it charges the localities when it makes the loans, there would be no profit on the interest, and therefore the observation which I have made would be correct, namely, that over a period of 60 years all the money which goes into every one of these slum-clearance projects would eventually come out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is, provided the 31/2 percent is sufficient to amortize the entire amount of money borrowed. But, I repeat, how can it, when a profit of $20,000,000 is made, thereby reducing subsidy payments to the sum of $53,000,000?

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, if the United States Housing Authority pays as much to borrow the money as it charges to lend the money, my observation is correct. The Senator says that because the United States Housing Authority gets its money for 1% percent and lends it at 31/2 percent, it makes a profit of the difference between 3½ percent which it receives for the loan of its money and 1% percent which it pays to borrow the money. The Senator is correct about that. I think that is about 21/8 percent. That is the profit on the interest so long as that situation prevails. But, even so, it would be only a mere pittance when compared with the $1,600,000,000 which eventually will be loaned, and it would be only a mere pittance of the annual subsidy under contracts which the Federal Government makes with the cities of America.

I asked Mr. Straus particularly about this interest:

For how long a period have you made these loans from the United States Government Treasury?

Mr. Straus said:

They are short-term loans. They are 5-year loans. And I think in one case a 10-year loan.

In other words, he has agreed to pay the Treasury the entire loan in a period of 5 or 10 years, and then he would have to refinance. He said:

Of course, Senator Typings, the interest rate is low today, but if the interest rate should go up in the future then the saving would immediately be translated into a loss.

And I said:

These contracts are for 60 years, are they not?

Mr. Straus answered:

Yes; we lend for 60 years, but we are borrowing on a 10-year basis and a 5-year basis, and consequently when the time comes to refinance these loans we have made from the Treasury it may be that we will have to pay 3 percent or 31/4 percent.

That is the situation as it exists today only. But even that would not alter the basic picture I have presented. Does the Senator from Louisiana know that with the exception of the profit and interest that over a period of 60 years every dollar of this money is coming out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. ELLENDER. I repeat, if the 31/2 percent-

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, if!

Mr. ELLENDER. If the 31/2 percent will service-Mr. TYDINGS. Let us leave out the "if."

Mr. ELLENDER. Will service that amount of money, why, of course, the Senator is correct. But, I repeat, what about the profit in interest that inures to the United States

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I have made some headway. Aside from the temporary profit on interest, which is only a small profit in proportion to the annual outlay, the cities of America are not putting up a single dime toward the construction of a single slum-clearance project. The Federal Government has made contracts in which it agrees to pay to every city in America every year an annual sum sufficient not only to liquidate the 90 percent which the city has borrowed from the United States Housing Authority but additional sums sufficient to pay the city back the 10 percent which the law requires the city to put up in the first instance. In effect these houses are being built all over America for private families out of the Treasury of the United States Government.

Senators, think of this. When Congress authorized $800,000,000 for slum clearance, at the same time it authorized the United States Housing Authority to commit the Congress by formal contract to appropriate every year for 60 years to the cities of America a sum sufficient to permit those cities to pay off those loans 100 percent.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not heard all of the very interesting argument of the Senator, but I should like to ask whether Congress can authorize any agency of government to bind the Government to make an annual appropriation for the next 60 years to take care of any subsidies.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Kentucky has asked a very interesting question. I shall not attempt to answer it. but I shall attempt to present some facts which may allow the Senator to draw his own conclusions.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. When we passed the Slum Clearance Act Senators were busy on other matters. Most Senators did not have any chance to read the bill or to study it. I had not had any chance to do so. But I became interested in it. I am in favor of slum clearance, and I did not want again to be in opposition. I assumed that the plan proposed was a pretty good plan. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and several other Senators were on the committee. I rose on the floor of the Senate and asked several questions. I turned to one provision in the bill, as the RECORD will show, and I said, "Let me understand this provision. The provision authorizes the United States Housing Administrator to make contracts with the cities of America under which for a period of 60 years in the future they will be given an annual subsidy." Sixty years is a long time. The measure at that time contained the language "up to 60 years," and if Senators will examine the debate I think-I am simply quoting from memory-the Senator from New York and the Senator from Massachusetts both said, "We do not intend to make contracts for longer than 20 years." I said, "Then why was the provision as to 60 years put in the bill?" They said, "That is the way it is done in other measures. This is a new venture, and we think perhaps we ought to have that provision in the bill." I said, "You are not proposing to use this subsidy provision, are you, to give to the cities 100 percent of the cost of these projects?" They said, "Well, no; that is not our intention."

Mr. President, I think I am the Senator who offered the amendment providing that the city must put up at least 10 percent of the original cost of the project. I said, "If cities feel they do not have to put up anything in a time of unemployment, their representatives will wear out the railroads running to Washington in order to get work for their com-LXXXIV--421 munities and to cut down their relief load and their tax bill, and the practice will become so general that this program will get out of hand; it will not be wise, and I am afraid that in time it will defeat the very fine purpose which is in mind, namely, to stimulate a slum-clearance program project in which the cities would be sufficiently interested at least to put up 10 percent." Over the protests of the authors of the bill, the Senate wrote that provision in the measure.

Mr. President, we thought then that no subsidy contract would be made sufficient to repay the cities the 10 percent they would advance. We thought that would be for all time the city's contribution. The other part they would have to pay back to the Federal Government. But now we find that the cities are to be given each year not only sufficient money to repay the Government the 90 percent which we authorized the United States Housing Authority to lend to the cities, but they are to be given each year in addition a sum which will repay them the 10 percent they were to put up.

So in the end, outside of the temporary interest profit to which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Ellender] has referred, the Federal Government is building houses in the cities of America with a 100-percent charge on the Treasury of the United States. I do not believe that is good business. I think the local communities, the States, and the cities are shirking their share of the responsibility. I think the citizens of the cities are shirking their share of the responsibility. The program is not being closely scrutinized because eventually all the money is coming from Washington to pay for it. It is my thought in speaking today not to tear down the slum-clearance program but to create some sentiment in this body, in the committee, and in the country so that some of the mechanics of the act can be rewritten before we are committed to another billion-dollar outlay.

Keep in mind, Senators, the fact that eventually, if the bill is enacted, in round numbers there will be \$1,600,000,000 in two or three authorizations, and the United States Housing Authority will bind the Congress to appropriate annually 31/2 percent of that sum, which will be given to the cities as a subsidy, and which the cities will give back to the United States Housing Authority to liquidate the loans which the cities have made. Therefore, there is involved not only \$800,000,000, but $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent every year for 60 years on the entire sum without the cities making any real contribution whatever.

In the city of Baltimore some splendid slum-clearance houses are being built, much better than the average house in Baltimore. They cost more per family unit than does the average house in Baltimore.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish, and then I will yield to the Senator.

I am delighted: I only wish we could build every man in America a house that would have in it everything in the world that his heart could wish for. If our system of business would stand for it, I should love to see such a result. However, I have a feeling-I may be wrong about it-that within 4 or 5 years the whole program will be rearranged, and it will be rearranged because of some of the things I am pointing out. I am pointing them out at this time not to defeat slum clearance, not to say that it is not a problem. not to say that we ought not to contribute to its solution. but so that in the end slum clearance will not bring down on itself the opprobrium which I fear will be brought on it unless there is a clear comprehension of the mechanics of the operation, and of what we can do in order to improve the act and make it more workable.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have been trying to ascertain just what the Senator's attitude is on slum-clearance legislation. Is the Senator opposed to any contribution by the Federal Government toward the rent so that the person who had previously been dedicated to a life of misery in the slums may be able to live in a place with fresh air and sanitation, thus bringing about a better health condition and reducing crime? Does the Senator take the position that the problem is no concern of the Federal Government, and that we ought not to make any contribution in the way of a subsidy toward bringing about the elimination of slums? Or is the Senator opposed to the accommodations which are being constructed as being too expensive?

I am trying to ascertain the Senator's attitude, because he says we are indulging in socialism. Does the Senator say we ought not to make any contribution toward the rent which the slum dweller, because of his very low income, is unable to pay for a more decent dwelling? I am trying to find out the Senator's attitude. Does the Senator think we should leave the question entirely to the local authorities, without any aid from the Federal Government? Does he think the problem is no concern of the Federal Government?

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall try to answer the Senator's question. He makes a very reasonable request. I fear he has drawn such a conclusion. Perhaps he was warranted in it. However, I had no intention of conveying such an idea. First, I do not say that there is no slum problem, or that we should not do something about it, or that the Federal Government has no part in the program. I shall answer the Senator's questions, as nearly as I can recall them, in my own way.

First of all, Mr. President, one of the things upon which I look with much concern is the constant disposition of communities to let Washington do it all. This country is 33 times the size of Great Britain. It is 16 times the size of France. It is 14 times the size of Germany. When we legislate for the United States, in effect we legislate for 48 nations; indeed, we legislate for a continent. If our country were of the same size as some European countries, many of the solutions adopted abroad could be engrafted on our own civilization without injury. However, our country is not of the same size as European countries. Furthermore, the people of Great Britain are Britons; the people of Germany are Germans; the people of France are French. Our people are a polyglot mixture of all races, all nationalities, and all creeds.

We have done pretty well. I have a feeling that one reason why we have done pretty well—although it has been carried to extremes in the past—is that we have tried to foster a sort of community interest in our States and cities. I know that today there are cities, counties, and, indeed, States, whose financial condition is so impaired that we cannot expect them to carry on as they would in normal times. However, the fact that such exceptions exist here and there is no reason for our relieving all the communities of America of what I consider their responsibility. If they themselves are unable to meet the problem, we should step in and assist them. That is one thing. However, it is another thing to have them put up a small proportion to start the project, and then say to them that they will get it all back in 60 years, and in reality will not have contributed a single cent.

I will say to the Senator from New York that, in my humble judgment, a larger proportion of the cost ought to be borne by the States or the cities. The condition of a man's home. and the circumstances in which he lives, constitute one of the greatest problems of any government. Primarily it is a local problem, but if the local communities cannot deal with itand many of them cannot-we should meet them half way. However, we ought not to go 100 percent of the way. I have been trying to drive home that thought in my various discussions of the question. In my desire to call to the attention of this body the apparent defects in the law, perhaps I have been too much of a partisan to make my own position clear. I have talked with Mr. Straus about the matter. I have talked with Mr. Keyserling about it. Always they confront me with the answer, "Well, this was tried in such and such a country." I have told those two gentlemen-and I now tell the Senate-that, in my humble judgment, one reason why we have escaped the intolerance, dictatorships, force, coercion, bloodshed, and war which have marked the history of Europe is that we have managed to set up a system of government under which the political thought of the people of the country cannot be regimented. We have different groups in which conditions are different, and Federal beneficence of a kindly and progressive nature produces the maximum of civilization and real human progress.

Let me say to the Senator from New York that I am thinking of asking the mayor of Havre de Grace—a town of 4,500 inhabitants, where I was born and reared—to come to Washington and obtain some slum-clearance money, because I can tell the mayor that it will not cost the city anything. I can say to him, "It is true that if you have a $200,000 project you will have to put up $20,000 of the cost of it, but the Federal Government will make an agreement with you, Mayor Pennington, to give you back each year for 60 years a sum of money sufficient not only to pay off your loan to the Federal Government but to pay off the $20,000 you put up, and it is a good proposition for you."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much impressed by the Senator's remarks. In the Senate, and, I presume, also in the House, individual Members have so much to look after in the way of legislation, and our Government has become so complex in carrying out the various things in which we are all interested, that we must necessarily follow other Members in a great many things. I am very much interested in the slum-clearance program. I am deeply sympathetic toward it. I wish to see it carried out in good faith. I have had nothing to do with framing slum-clearance legislation. I have had to depend on other Senators, and follow them.

The Senator has made an impression on me in respect to the 10 percent which the cities originally put up. He says the cities receive all of it back. Like the Senator, I am very much impressed with the idea that such an arrangement is not quite fair. I agree that the communities ought to be financially interested to some extent; and it seems to me that if they were required to put up 10 percent, with no opportunity of getting it back, it would increase their interest in the projects, and save the Government the expenditure of a great amount of money.

I am wondering whether the Senator, who has given the subject a great deal of thought, could not offer an amendment—and a very simple amendment, it seems to me, would meet the situation—that would prohibit the Government paying any of that 10 percent? That, at least, would get us somewhere, and I think, from the information I derive from the Senator's remarks, would greatly improve conditions. Would not that be true?

Mr. TYDINGS. That would be a good thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Could not that be done by a very simple amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me answer the question of the Senator from New York, which I think will also answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska. For my part, I would rather make an annual appropriation to the cities and towns with no string tied to it, just as we do for roads; give them so much a year toward rehousing the underhoused of this country; make it an annual appropriation, if that be deemed wise; but I do not like to have to borrow a billion dollars on a 60-year proposition, because that would mean that the Government of the United States would be charged every year with a definite sum of money. I would rather give the entire $800,000,000 to the cities, under proper restrictions, and say, "If you will do so and so you can come and get a part of this sum for slum clearance in your particular city after the experts have demonstrated that the living conditions are way below a standard that might be called humanly decent." I think that the genesis of the wrong from the governmental standpoint is that for a period of 60 years in the future we are allowing the Federal administrator to commit us to appropriations the amount of which we do

It is true, let me say to the Senator from Nebraska, that even if we should get the 10 percent back from the cities the rent charged the occupants of the houses would have to be a little higher than it would be if we gave the cities the whole hundred percent, because, obviously, the cities would probably add as part of the rent charge to the lowest rental rate a sufficient amount to liquidate their 10-percent outlay over a period of 60 years, unless they have beneficent administrations that want to perform a generous and humane act.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. I yield now to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is it not a fact that the 10 percent that is not loaned by the United States Housing Authority is actually raised in cash by the local housing authority?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.
Mr. ELLENDER. Is it not a fact that the money is raised by the local authority, from local sources, and repaid by the

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot quite agree with that statement because in the city of Baltimore, in my own State, I know what the Senator suggests is not true there. The housing authority is appointed by the mayor of each of the cities, and obviously it pretty well charts its course in accordance with the city administration's wishes. The local housing authorities hold office for a limited period of time, and they have control of the rent. Therefore, subject always to the supervision of the United States Housing Authority, which wants to keep the rents down, in most instances it is perfectly possible for the local authority to charge a sufficient amount to repay the 10 percent. I do not say that is being done now, but, whether it is done or whether it is not done, the point is that the city that puts up a hundred thousand dollars gets the hundred thousand dollars back from the United States Housing Authority.

Mr. ELLENDER. How can it? How does it do it when the Senator just admitted that under the law the $100,000 is paid over to the local authority and that $100,000 must be paid by the city itself, by the city government, and not by the housing authority?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true; but let me take the Senator's argument. Of course, the United States Housing Authority.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President-

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. The United States Housing Authority is an agency of the cities; there can be no doubt about that; it is the child and not the parent. Even though the subsidy is paid to the United States Housing Authority, it is in reality paid to the city, because it is paid to the agent of the principal.

If the Senator means to argue that at the present time the hundred thousand dollars from the United States Housing Authority is not going back in the Treasury, neither he nor I can answer that, because none of these projects are built as yet; and it is going to take 60 years for the hundred thousand dollars to be paid back to the city; and neither the Senator knows nor do I know what is going to happen to the hundred thousand dollars as it is paid back in 60 little installments over a period of years.

That does not alter the fact that a hundred percent of the cost of the project comes out of the Federal Government. If the Federal Government gives an annual subsidy which over 60 years aggregates the principal and interest of the whole $100,000—and I have proved here by figures that it does-my contention is that the Federal Government is putting up, through these annual subsidies, 100 percent of the cost of the project. No one can take the figures and dispute them. I am quoting the figures given to me by Mr. Keyserling, who is deputy administrator and general counsel of the United States Housing Authority. He came to my office and after an hour's conversation during which I had in mind the view the Senator has expressed—and Mr. Keyserling said the same thing-I said, "Mr. Keyserling, on the basis of your figures, in the end will not the Federal Treasury give to the local community a sum of money over 60 years which will be 100 percent of the original cost of the project?" He said, "Senator, if you put it in that way, although that is not the intention and is not the way we look at it, your remark is a true remark."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I do not know of any provision by which the city pays anything to the local housing authorities except in the way of a remission of taxes.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all.

Mr. TAFT. There is no agreement on the part of the city to pay interest and establish a sinking fund in respect to the 10 percent.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true, and I was coming to that.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President-

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. If the Senator will take the annual report of the United States Housing Authority and look at the fcotnotes and the statement of what the cities have put up, he will find that the State and local contributions are in the form of waived taxes and are not in the form of actual money. The municipalities do not have to put up a penny actually, but they agree not to charge taxes to the tenants in the houses equivalent to the 10 percent over a period of years what the 100 percent cost will be. The Federal Government puts up the entire cost of building the plant.

The thought I want to leave with Senators before I conclude is that there are in this country houses without toilets and having only the old-style primitive arrangements of 40 or 50 or more years ago. They have toilets detached from the houses, which are often very unsanitary in places where people are crowded together. There are houses in this Nation without running water, and those living in the houses frequently have to rely for their water supply on contaminated wells. There are houses in America without sufficient light. There are families living in crowded conditions which constitute a menace to every healthy man who walks in the neighborhood. It is not the essence of the plan which we are considering, except, perhaps, in some respects to correct those conditions. When the housing authorities go to a row of houses which have been occupied for a long while and which have fallen into a state of semi or complete disrepair, they do not inquire whether they have running water, or whether they have electric lights, or whether they have toilet facilities per se. They say, "This is a blighted area, and therefore we are going to tear these houses down and erect in their stead modern apartment houses." That is a beautiful idea, but let me show where it leads.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President-

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish this thought, then I will yield. According to the President of the United States and other authorities, 8,000,000 families are poorly housed in this country. If we multiply the estimated average cost per home of $5,534, including the demolition of the buildings which are to be replaced, by 8,000,000, we find that it will take a capital outlay of $44,272,000,000 to complete the rehousing of those who are now living below the American standard. On the basis of the 31/2-percent annual subsidy now being used as a yardstick on the 140 approved projects now under construction, the annual subsidy required from the Treasury to complete this program would amount to $1,549,520,000 for a period of 60 years; and, of course, 60 times that amount is $92,971,200,000. That would be the total cost of the annual subsidies over a 60-year period.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me finish this thought, and then I will yield to the Senator.

If we are going eventually to be charged with approximately a billion dollars a year in subsidies, I should much rather appropriate that sum of money, with no repayment strings attached to it, to match similar sums put up by communities that want to improve the living conditions of those in the communities, and call it a day. It is not primarily our business to manage homes in Nebraska or Maryland or South Dakota or Oregon. It is our business to assist the States; but, Senators, we are getting into the home-building business in our own right. The guise of calling it local is a very thin one; and I am hopeful that I may arouse here sentiment for a new approach to this problem which will confine the activities of the Federal Government to making annual appropriations similar to those made for our road program—under proper supervision and proper safeguards, of course—to communities which desire to match to some appreciable degree the sums which we annually appropriate, and call it a day. But when the Federal Government starts to make with municipalities contracts extending over a 60-year period, wherein it agrees to give the municipalities certain sums of money annually, and the municipalities agree to give the Federal Government certain sums of money annually, and each sum wipes out the other, the transactions are simply bookkeeping transactions and bring about a change in our governmental system without any beneficial effect.

I should like to see surveys made in Baltimore, Cincinnati, New York, and elsewhere in which an American standard of living would be the yardstick, and have houses condemned not instantly but over a period of years. The bad ones ought to be razed immediately. The Federal Government ought to appropriate annually a sum of money to be matched by the municipality or the State to take care of that situation. But our program is to do it all, without any commensurate local responsibility and, in my judgment, too often without a yardstick of American standards.

That is the thought I am trying to make plain. It is my thought that far less than $5,000 per family unit can be employed in a rehabilitation program. The money will go farther and we shall be able to help more families that require help than under the present program.

I desire now to read one short paragraph, and then I will yield to the Senator from New York. I wish to read from a recent radio address by Mr. Nathan Straus, the Federal Housing Administrator, because it illustrates what I have just been saying. I quote what Mr. Straus said as showing the need for a slum-clearance program:

Not enough new homes are now being built, and those that are built are rented or sold at prices far above the means of most of the people. Four out of five of the new homes built in the last 10 years in the cities and towns of this country were built to rent for more than $40 per month, or to sell at a price which constitutes an equivalent rental. Thus, four out of five new homes building are within the reach of only one family out of five.

I do not know whether or not that is so, but I am going to assume that it is so. Mr. Straus says that for 10 years the homes we have been building are those which are being occupied by the economic middle class or the economic upper class. The homes are not being built for the great economic subthird of the population. Therefore, this program is designed, Mr. Straus says, to take care of that need.

I went to the Federal Housing Authority—that is another branch of the building activities of the Government-and I said, "What is the average cost of the property which you have insured in this country during the past year?" Federal Housing Authority locked up its figures, and said that the average cost of the houses it had insured-that is, houses that were being built or repaired by private capitalwas $5,384 per home. Bear in mind that Mr. Straus says that the homes being insured under the Federal Housing Authority are homes for the upper economic level, and not the lower; and yet the cost of the average slum-clearance project is $130 more than the average cost of the homes built under the F. H. A. No one can make me believe-I may be dense about it-that that is the best we can do with the limited amount of money we have with which to eliminate the slums of the country. I believe that a lower-priced unit can be worked out. Heaven knows that if we could give the occupants of these buildings 10 rooms to a family, with baths and furnaces and other conveniences, I should be delighted; but we have not enough money to do that. The projects will cost $44,000,000,000 at the present average price; they will cost a huge amount in annual subsidy; and we shall still have the problem. The question is, Do we want to fix the yardstick more definitely, so as to provide for the great class of underhoused people who are living in unhealthful surroundings, and make the money go as far as possible, while raising the whole undertaking to a higher level?

There is no limitation worthy of the name on these projects. I think we did provide some sort of a limitation. I will ask the Senator from New York about that. I think it was a thousand dollars a room, or something like that.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

And that figure has not been approached in the construction. To my way of thinking, however, when the $1,000 limitation was put on, I considered it as an average of the whole thing, including the cost of demolishing the old building.

Mr. ELLENDER. The only thing left out is the cost of demolishing the old buildings.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the debate on the floor of the Senate, in my judgment, although it was not specifically brought out, was to the effect that the completed family unit replacing the slum would be built at not a greater cost than $1,000 per unit; and it is being done in many cases at $6,000 per family unit, at $6,300 per family unit, at $5,800 per family unit, at $5,500 per family unit. In Baltimore alone some of the family units in apartment houses are estimated to cost more than $6,000 each; and I will make the assertion that the average home owned by a Baltimorean today does not cost $6,000, if we take the city as a whole. We have a city of homes, where 60 percent of our population, even in the depression, own their own homes, and where apartment houses are very few, and where the "little white steps" of individual home owners, as people say, sprinkle the whole city. Over 60 percent of the people living in those homes own their own homes.

If that be true, and if some of the slum-clearance projects are costing more than $5,000, $5,500, $6,000 per family unit, then it is my opinion that we are not devoting this money to the purposes for which it was originally conceived, namely, to help persons of this class to have reasonable comforts and reasonably healthy conveniences. Instead, we are pouring out the money in a grandiose scheme which in the end, I am afraid, will give the whole program a black eye.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the figures he quoted a moment ago. I think he stated that the F. H. A. cost per dwelling was lower than that of the United States Housing Authority.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did.

Mr. WAGNER. I have the exact figures here. The average unit cost—and this includes the land and nondwelling facilities—is $4,507 under the U.S. H. A. and $5,530 under the F. H. A.

Mr. TYDINGS. How many units does the average include?

Mr. WAGNER. It is the family unit.

Mr. TYDINGS. How many units are embraced in the average? How many projects are embraced in the average?

Mr. WAGNER. This is the country-wide average.

Mr. WAGNER. This is the country-wide average.
Mr. TYDINGS. I got the same figures the Senator is reading; and while I will not be positive, because I have not looked at them for 3 or 4 weeks, my understanding is that those figures are for 14 projects only. Mr. Keyserling came to my office; and, mind you, the figures are only estimates. Those projects are not yet completed. That is only what the authorities think the cost is going to be.

Mr. WAGNER. As a matter of fact, as the contracts have been signed, the actual cost is even lower than the estimates.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is true in some of the cases that the contracts were lower than the estimates; but anybody who has ever built a house knows that even when one signs a contract he cannot safely assume that the contract price is all the house is going to cost him. There are extras. There are overruns. The United States Housing Authority allows 5 percent for overruns. There are always changes and things which come up which add to the cost of the building. I think the Senator will be well advised if he will consider those figures only as, we will say, the best estimates available at this moment, and I shall be very much astounded if the final figures are not greatly in excess of the

Mr. WAGNER. Since the Senator sympathizes with this program of trying to bring better homes to the slum dwellers, I wanted to ask him if his program is to appropriate a large sum each year and give it to the localities on a matching hasis?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would not want the Senator to misunderstand me to indicate that I believe that they should have to put up half, but we ought to work out a formula, based on research, of what we consider a fair amount for the locality to contribute. It might be a State a part and the Federal Government a part, or a city a part and the State none, but we ought to work out a formula, as we do for roads. Every year we would make the annual appropriations, and there would be no repayment of the Federal Government's part. Let me say to the Senator that, in effect, the cities are not paying us back.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not agree at all with the Senator's analogy. I think it is a very unfair analogy.

Mr. TYDINGS. The analogy which I used I got from Mr. Keyserling himself. I said, "Mr. Keyserling, how much does the Federal Government give to the cities in a rent subsidy, or whatever you want to call it, each year? What is the percentage?" He named the figure. "How much does the city repay to the Federal Government each year in annual payment?" He stated an amount. "Now, Mr. Keyserling, as a matter of fact, does not the Federal Government give to the city each year a sum of money equivalent to what the city gives to the Federal Government in liquidation of its loan?" "Oh," he said, "Senator, the truth is that we give them this money so as to force the rents down."

I said, "Of course, you do; and I agree to that. The city having no part of the cost of the project because of these annual subsidies over a 60-year period, they can afford to charge lower rents. I am not quarreling with that. But what I want to know is, How much do you pay them a year, and how much do they pay you a year?"

The figures which I read-and I could not have gotten them in any other way-were given to me by Mr. Keyserling. They show that 3.6133 percent is the annual payment required of the city, and that 3.5 percent is the amount of the annual subsidy. I do not care whether or not it forces down the rent, or what it does-

Mr. WAGNER. I do care.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean for the sake of the argument; the point is that the Federal Government gives to the city every year practically the same sum of money the city gives back to the Federal Government.

Mr. WAGNER. I think that is not an accurate statement of the facts. That money actually goes to the tenants to reduce their rents-

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with that. Mr. WAGNER. Then, why does the Senator constantly say it is the city which is receiving the contribution? The Federal Government is making the contribution to help the unfortunate person who, because of his low income, is unable to pay a rent which would make the enterprise profitable for private industry. So the city and the Federal Government together say, "We will make a contribution so that he may be able to live in this particular home and enjoy sanitation

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree to all that. Suppose the Federal Government did not give any subsidy to the city. And suppose the city did not make any payment annually to the Federal Government. We would have the same situation we have in handing them over the money and taking it again.

Mr. WAGNER. I will tell the Senator what would happen; the slum dweller would continue to dwell in the slums. That is what would happen.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. WAGNER. The only effect of the Senator's program would be that the slum dweller would remain in the slums. I am trying to bring him out of the slums.

Mr. TYDINGS. This illustrates one of the troubles with the era in which we are living. If a man rises to talk any facts, if he makes a point and if he proves his point, how is he met? "Oh, the poor will starve, people will die in these dark buildings," and a wave of emotionalism sweeps aside every vestige of common sense and reason, and bad legislation is put on the statute books.

Mr. WAGNER. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am talking facts.

Mr. WAGNER. So am I.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am just as anxious to help the underprivileged of this country as is the Senator, but I do not concede that this bill is going to do it.

Mr. WAGNER. It is doing it. This is what the Senator asked me, and my answer was accurate; the Senator said, "Suppose the Federal Government makes no contribution toward the reduction of these rents, and the city makes no contribution in the form of a subsidy toward the reduction of the rents."

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not ask the Senator that.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I did not say a thing about the payment of rent. What I asked the Senator was merely this: If the Federal Government makes no annual contribution to the local housing authority-

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator now speaking of subsidies?

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh-

Mr. WAGNER. Do not get impatient.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; let us cool down.

Mr. WAGNER. Be calm. [Laughter in the galleries.] The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). If the Senator will suspend, the Chair feels it necessary to admonish the occupants of the galleries that no manifestation of any kind is permitted, under the rules of the Senate, no loud talking, or anything of that kind. The Senator from Maryland has the floor. The Chair will also ask Senators to observe the rules of the Senate. Senators must address the Chair and obtain permission of the Senator speaking before he may be interrupted.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, what I attempted to say to the Senator from New York was that if the local housing authority makes no annual payment to the Federal Housing Authority, and if the Federal Housing Authority makes no annual payment to the local housing authority, we would be in the same position as if one gave the money to the other and the other gave the money back again. That was all I said. Is that accurate?

Mr. WAGNER. That is accurate; but let me-

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all I said. Mr. WAGNER. But—

Mr. TYDINGS. And the Senator says I am accurate.

Mr. WAGNER. Will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. I yield for a question.

Mr. WAGNER. The answer is subject to this modification: The determination of the subsidy is something quite different from the determination of the interest to be paid upon the loan made for the construction of the project. The subsidy depends upon the difference between the rent which the occupant can afford to pay and that which has been paid in order to meet all the fixed and maintenance charges. That subsidy is apt to be a variable amount, and in some cases it may amount to less than the 31/2 percent of which the Senator is speaking. Besides, under the contracts there are periods of time when there is a reexamination into the amount of rents that are paid, and into the economic situation, to determine whether the occupant is in a position to pay a higher rent, or whether there is any further need for subsidies at all. So that there may come a time during this 60-year period upon which he has relied-as it has come in the other countries whose experience we are following—when the subsidy will be reduced to a very small sum. I know the Senator is not easy to be persuaded upon that point, but if he will examine the experience of Sweden and the experience of England, he will find that already there have been some variations in the subsidies, and a reduction because of the improved economic

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator studied conditions in Sweden, and Great Britain, and other countries?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; I was over there. Mr. TYDINGS. So have I studied them. I have been doing nothing for 2 months but read about these other

Mr. WAGNER. I went over there.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know the Senator was over there for a week.

Mr. WAGNER. No; I was there longer than that.

Mr. TYDINGS. How long was the Senator there?

Mr. WAGNER. I was there 3 weeks.
Mr. TYDINGS. And in 3 weeks the Senator studied the German and the Swedish and the British systems for caring for the housing situation. Mr. President, I say that is commendable, and I take my hat off to the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well; whether I know them or not is another question. The point is that while the amortization and interest upon the loan made is a fixed sum which must be met each year, the subsidy is apt to be a variable sum, depending upon the economic situation, and that it may be reduced to such a figure that the Federal Government will not be called upon to make the contribution which it is now making

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President. I wish to be courteous to the Senator, but it seems to me he is making a speech, and not asking me anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Notwithstanding everything that may be said, the Federal Treasury is putting up all the money to build all the apartment houses under all the slum-clearance programs now under way in the United States; the cities are not putting up 10 percent of the cash, but are simply agreeing to waive a certain amount of the taxes over a period of 60 years; the Federal Treasury is being committed by the United States Housing Authority to make an annual contribution, under formal contracts entered into with the cities, to pay a sum each year sufficient to enable the local housing authorities to give back to the National Housing Authority enough to liquidate the entire cost of the projects.

The program is one of state socialism; it is not slum clearance. The Federal Government has gone into the business of building private homes all over the land out of the Treasury of the United States, without any contribution from the local authorities worthy of the name.

There is a regular foot race on the part of all the mayors in America to get this money, because they can get the cost of an entire project put up by the Federal Government, and their 10 percent is figured in terms of taxes to be waived in the future, and not in real money. They furthermore know that the Federal Government agrees by another contract that when they get this money it will give them sufficient money each year to permit them to repay the so-called loan over a 60-year period. The whole thing is a general program; there is nothing specific in the law; and under that general program we are permitting Mr. Straus to commit Congress to make annual appropriations for 60 years in the future.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President-

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], because he has asked me to yield. Then I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I am in agreement with the Senator from Maryland. I will go further, if he will permit me to take a minute or two. I believe that relief, charity, slum clearance, the entire question of public relief is a local and an emergency question. I believe the National Government should only step in and help the local government when the situation has gotten away from the local government. I believe that the greater the degree of local administration of relief in all its branches, the better it will be policed, the less waste there will be in it, and the more efficient it will become.

The State of Oregon has not asked for a single dollar for slum clearance, nor do I expect it to ask for a single dollar. We have no slums in Oregon. We have no tenements. We have zoning systems in our cities. The matter of slums is within our control, and slums exist only in those communities which have let the situation get out of their control.

I will name 19 of the 48 States which are not included in the list of States in which appropriations for slum clearances have been made.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that and do it at the end of my remarks? I should be very glad to have the Senator do it now, but I am obliged to leave

I wish to thank the Senator from Oregon because he has brought to mind something I had overlooked but intended to comment on briefly.

Mr. President, when riding on trains out of Washington in any direction-north, west, south, or east-Senators will find the same condition with respect to houses in the country that exists in slums in the cities. They will see houses withcut toilets, houses without electric lights, houses without any running water at all, houses which are rickety and needing paint and repairs, but is there a dollar provided in this program to rehabilitate people living in houses of that sort? Not one dollar is provided for that purpose. The great agricultural sections of the United States contain many people who are poorly housed, who live in old, dilapidated, and insecure buildings; but there is nothing in this program for them; not a penny is provided in it for them. Yet the agriculturists of the country will be obliged to contribute by way of taxes to pay their proportionate share for what is filtered into the large municipalities.

The other day, in riding from Baltimore to Washington, I and another man began to count the occupied houses along the way which looked to be far below the American standard of housing. We counted 20 such houses in a very short distance.

When this program was originally presented to the Senate there was practically no debate on it. There was some little discussion of it, but no far-reaching debate. As a matter of fact, the provisions of the original measure were general. It provided that the United States Housing Authority might do thus and so. There was no amount stated in the subsidy provision. That is how the 60-year provision got into the bill. If it had not been for the discussion of the measure indulged in by some of us when it was first brought up on the floor of the Senate, the 10-percent provision would not have been written into the law. The Senator had his own reasons, but I do not believe the author of the bill, the Senator from New York, wanted the 10-percent provision written into the bill. He wanted the Federal Government to put up the whole 100 percent, and now the Government is doing it anyway. The 10 percent is interpreted merely as remission of taxes not as 10 percent of the cost of building the building, which was the intention of the Congress. It was intended by Congress that the municipality should put up 10 percent of the cost of building these houses, but, instead of that, the municipalities are not putting up a penny. They simply agree that they will waive certain taxes on these houses in the future, and that is a violation of the 10-percent clause of the act of Congress.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. One of us is confused. The tax exemption refers, as I understand-and I am quite clear about it to the contributions made by the localities in the form of subsidies. But so far as the actual construction costs are concerned, the municipalities must put up the 10 percent, and they do.

Mr. TYDINGS. In cold cash? Mr. WAGNER. No, no. The tax exemption is something that relates only to subsidies.

Mr. TYDINGS. The municipality puts up the 10 percent in cash, does it?

Mr. WAGNER. For construction.

Mr. TYDINGS. The young man sitting by the Senator from New York states that to be the fact? He is from the Housing Authority.

Mr. WAGNER. I did not ask the young man. Mr. TYDINGS. I do not reflect upon him, but I want to pin down the responsibility for this.

Mr. WAGNER. Cannot the Senator take my word for it? Mr. TYDINGS. No; because Mr. Keyserling himself in my office told me that they were taking this 10 percent in the form of a waiver of taxes. Someone is wrong about it.

Mr. WAGNER. Then, it is not in compliance with the

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield in a moment. I may be thoroughly wrong in the statement I have made. I am going to make a public request of the Senator from New York. I ask him to write to the United States Housing Authority and find out if in all cases the 10 percent is being put up in cash as Congress intended it to be put up, or whether it is put up in the form of tax exemptions, and let us have the facts before the Senate. I may be wrong, and if I am I shall be very glad to retract what I have said. But I state only what the Deputy Administrator told me was the case, namely, that the municipalities do not put up a single dime; that they contribute by way of taxes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is it not a fact that the law provides that the city shall help to reduce the rent by putting up 20 percent, either in cash or by way of tax remissions?

Mr. TYDINGS. Why, of course.

Mr. ELLENDER. That relates to the subsidy. The 10 percent has to be put up in cash.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; we will clean that up when we find out about it.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator does not have to. The law so provides.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have read the law quite carefully, and if the law is being followed in the sense we thought it was going to be followed when it was passed I am being very badly fooled. If anyone will turn back to the debate and the information that came out when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] were discussing the matter, and look at the questions, he will find that the workings of the law are greatly at variance from what it was thought they would be at the time the measure was enacted.

Mr. President, I hope someone will offer an amendment to cut down the amount of this appropriation, because I do not believe the plan is a good one; it certainly is not the best plan. I think there should be a study made of this question and the law rewritten before we spend or commit the Government to spend $800,000,000 more to build houses under this

Do Senators know that we have enacted legislation under which the United States Housing Administrator can say how much Congress will have to appropriate next year under formal contracts in the form of annual subsidies? It is not a question of what we say we will appropriate. We have given authority to the United States Housing Authority to say for a period of 60 years in the future what we will give the municipalities annually by way of current appropriation, which in itself is a bad system. I hope we will confine this program to providing people with bathrooms and running water and electric lights and some ventilation, particularly in the congested areas, and not go running over the country building apartment houses which cost $5,500 a unit in many cases and in others cost over $6,000 a unit.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Where are those apartments?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me see the United States Housing Authority's annual report.

Mr. WAGNER. The apartments are not completed as yet.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me see the annual report and I will show the Senator where they are.

Mr. WAGNER. Where are the apartments to which the Senator refers? Are they finished? Is the Senator talking about finished projects?

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a minute. The Senator asked me a question. Now let us have the facts.

Mr. WAGNER. Here is the report.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hold in my hand the Annual Report of the United States Housing Authority. I suppose they know what they are saying. All I can go by is to read the report and assume that it is reasonably, if not completely, accurate. Let us see what happens in New York, for example. Here is a project in New York City.

Mr. WAGNER. What is the project?

Mr. TYDINGS. "Cost of new housing per dwelling unit, $6,330."

Mr. WAGNER. What project is it? Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot tell the Senator. It is contained in the report. The cost is $6,330. I show the item to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. That is the total.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly it is the total. "Cost per dwelling unit."

Mr. WAGNER. "Net construction cost, $4,148." Mr. TYDINGS. Let me explain it.

Mr. WAGNER. That is what the law provides. Do not confuse the situation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it. Mr. CONNALLY. Under the rules of the Senate, Senators are supposed to speak audibly so the others of us can hear what is said. We cannot hear the little tête-à-tête.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will state it again.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to hear a public statement made of the private conversation.

Mr. TYDINGS. When I said some of these projects cost $6,000 a family unit the Senator from New York asked me to name them. I procured a copy of the report from the young man sitting next to him and called off one project in New York State the cost of which per unit is $6,330. That amount appears under the title "Cost of new housing per dwelling unit."

This is the report of the Housing Authority itself. Therefore, I think the cost per dwelling unit of more than $6,000 on some projects has been pretty well authenticated.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator says, "Let us look at the net construction cost." When we take a family out of a tumbledown building and put them in another, we must look at the cost of doing it. In order to break down the cost the Housing Authority has items which it calls "equipment," "architects and overhead," "dwelling facility" charges, and "nondwelling facility" charges. The point I make is that it costs $6,330 per family unit to destroy the slum house and put another in its place. Am I wrong?

Mr. WAGNER. No; the Senator is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all I wanted to know. Mr. WAGNER. Including all the cost of clearing the slums. When the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Byrd] offered his amendment limiting the cost to $4,000 per unit, he excluded the cost of the land, because he recognized that in many of the areas the slum property has very high value, and it would be unfair to put a limitation of $4,000 upon the construction cost, including the cost of the land.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator-

Mr. WAGNER. As the Senator made the statement, it sounded as though there were a clear violation of the law in the figures which he stated. The figure is $4,100, exclusive of the cost of the land. Is not that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will say to the Senator-

Mr. WAGNER. Is my statement correct?
Mr. TYDINGS. Let me go through the whole list, and then there will be no argument about what I said or did not say. The first column is headed "Land." The land for this $6,330 apartment costs $823 a family. That means $5,507 for the dwelling if we eliminate the land. I have marked the items in ink

What is the next item? It is "Nondwelling facilities." How much do they cost? They cost $893. "Nondwelling facilities" are grading, paving, and things around the building, which have been eliminated.

The next item is the net construction cost, $4,148.

The next item is "Equipment, architects, and overhead," $466 per family unit.

The next item is "Dwelling facilities." The total is $4,614. At the time the Byrd amendment was offered on the floor of the Senate it was the intention of the Senator who offered it, as it was of the Senator from Maryland, who spoke in favor of it, and I believe of the Senate, that the outside cost per dwelling unit should be not more than $1,000 a room. However, the Housing Authority gets away from that requirement by putting the architects in a separate class and saying that that item will not be figured as a part of the cost per room. They get away from the requirement by putting the equipment which goes into the building, the ice box and the electric-light fixtures, into "Nondwelling facilities." They confine the $1,000 per room to the sheer, naked construction of the building itself.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I know the Senator does not want to be unfair

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I do not.

Mr. WAGNER. Let me read the amendment as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Byrn] offered it on the floor. It was on the basis of that amendment that the debate took place.

Mr. TYDINGS. Read it.
Mr. WAGNER. The amendment says:

No contract for any loan, annual contribution, or capital grant made pursuant to this act shall be entered into by the Authority with respect to any project hereafter initiated costing more than $4,000 per family unit, or more than $1,000 per room, excluding land, demolition, and nondwelling facilities.

That is the amendment as it was offered by the Senator from Virginia, because he recognized the difficulties in connection with the value of land in slum areas. The language I have read is in the statute itself.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true; but the point I make is that in order to hold down the construction costs "architects and overhead" and other items have been eliminated to break down the naked construction costs, when such items are really part of the cost of the unit.

Mr. WAGNER. I wonder why the Senator made the statement that he was sure that when the matter was under consideration on the floor of the Senate the intention of the Senate was to include the very items which are excluded in the law and which were excluded in the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator will have an opportunity to reply in his own time. All I wish to say is that before I was interrupted I made the statement that the cost per family unit was $6,330 in one New York apartment house which is being built under the slum-clearance program. I do not care whether part of the cost is land, architects, or what not. The outside cost is $6,330; and I believe we could take $6,330 and do a better job than is being done in New York City. I do not think it is necessary to spend that much to remodel a slum building. I think it could be remodeled and provided with modern improvements for half that sum. The tenants would be just as well satisfied, and the money would go twice as far, and would take care of others who will have to pay their proportionate part of the taxes while they live in quarters which are vastly inferior to those now being built.

I believe the whole program needs a yardstick. In view of the haphazard way in which the program is being carried out, I think the appropriation of another $800,000,000 would be a waste of money. At least 10 or 15 projects in the summary cost more than $6,000 per family unit in slum clearance. while more than half of the homes in Baltimore cost less than $5,000 per family unit. I do not think it is fair to the workingman who is trying to buy his own home to erect houses superior to his own, exempt the occupants of those homes from the payment of part of the taxes which he has to pay, and furnish rent subsidies from the Federal Treasury, to which he must contribute in Federal taxes so that the Government may have the money to carry on the program.

I believe the day is coming in the next 2 or 3 years when the whole program will be taken apart on the floor of the Senate. Whether I am right or wrong about it, I do not believe we ought to go further at this time with an appropriation of $800,000,000 until the whole program has been revamped and made more practical and more workable, and until the local communities bear a larger share of the cost than they are now bearing.

As I have said, my own idea is to give people the minimum comforts of life, such as running water, bathrooms, electric lights, and so forth. I do not think it is necessary to go into communities and raze a great many buildings, destroying them completely. I believe they could be rehabilitated at one-third or one-half the cost of new construction, and the money could be made to go twice as far. The rents would be lower than they would be in the case of new projects, and the whole program would be more humane.

Having uttered this protest, if we are unable to obtain a reduction, I wish to be recorded as against the bill, not because I feel that there is no slum-clearance question but because the solution offered is not a worthy one with which to meet the problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER obtained the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana vield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question. Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Maryland has just referred to the interest of the worker in this program. Before the Senator from Louisiana begins I should like to have read a letter which I have just received from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator from New York know whether or not Mr. Green has read in detail the report of the United States Housing Authority?

Mr. WAGNER. I cannot tell the Senator whether he has or not, but Mr. Green is one of our distinguished labor leaders. Mr. TYDINGS. I know all that. I like Mr. Green.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think he would comment upon any legislation unless he was thoroughly familiar with it and with the workings of the particular agency.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from Louisiana will yield for a moment, I shall then leave the Chamber. My own opinion is that Mr. Green, like every other person, is thoroughly in favor of a slum-clearance program, and that his letter is an endorsement of a slum-clearance program. While I do not mean to say that Mr. Green is not somewhat familiar with the problem, I doubt if he has had the time, busy man as he is, to go into all the tables which the Senator from New York and I have been reading.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from New York. Mr. WAGNER. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he remain in the Chamber long enough to hear the letter

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, Washington, D. C., June 6, 1939.

Hon. Robert F. Wagner,

The Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Wagner: In response to innumerable requests from

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: In response to innumerable requests from national and international unions, central labor unions, and local unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in all parts of the country, I should like to bring to your attention the acute and pressing need for the expansion of the low-rent housing and slum-clearance program designed to rid our communities of slums and to bring decent, well-built housing within the reach of families whose incomes now compel them to live in slums.

The Wagner-Steagall Act of 1937 had the unanimous support of the American Federation of Labor and the widespread backing of all representative groups. The program thus far developed under this act has fully met the expectations of its supporters as thoroughly sound, well administered, and extremely economical program. However, labor realizes today, more than ever before, that the extremely small scale to which this program has been limited will make it impossible to even begin to satisfy the rapidly rising the extremely small scale to which this program has been limited will make it impossible to even begin to satisfy the rapidly rising need for low-rent housing to accommodate low-income families whose needs can never be filled by private enterprise alone.

The American Federation of Labor, at its annual convention held in Houston, Tex., in October 1938, went unanimously on record in favor of enlarging the authorization for construction loans and for annual contributions under the U. S. H. A. in order to insure the expansion of this program.

The amendments to the United States Housing Act sponsored by you and embodied in the Senate bill 591 are designed to accomplish this purpose. The adoption of these amendments providing for the increased authorization of construction loans and for the additional $45,000,000 in annual contributions will make it possible to rehouse under this program nearly 500,000 families living in unsafe, insanitary, and unfit dwellings. This means that the expanded U. S. H. A. program will benefit nearly 1,700,000 persons. With increased authorization, the U. S. H. A. program will provide 2 full years' work to 330,000 building mechanics and laborers at the site of construction. It will proportionately increase the employment, the purchasing power, and the business activity in the industries which must service this construction with materials and equipment and which are most in need of stimulation at this time

On behalf of 5,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor, their families and friends, and on behalf of 1,000,000 building-trades mechanics and laborers who are still unemployed, I want to convey to you this plea for the prompt enactment of S. 591, so that the continuity and expansion of the program could be assured, providing a means to meet our most insistent national need on this economical and self-liquidating basis.

Sincerely yours,

WM. GREEN President, American Federation of Labor.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Louisiana proceeds, will he yield to me in order that I may raise the question of a quorum? I think it would be well to have a larger attendance of Senators present to listen to the Senator's remarks.

Mr. ELLENDER. Very well.

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, because the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings] saw fit to attack the pending bill, I am going to reverse the order in which I first intended to address myself to the Senate. I am going first to attempt to answer some of the arguments made by him, and then I propose to explain the bill.

I do not want to accuse the Senator from Maryland of misrepresentation; but I do say that the statements made by him do not jibe with the provisions of the act which was passed by the Senate in 1937.

The Senator states that the 10 percent which the local authority must raise is in fact not put up by that authority; that if it is, it is paid back by the Federal Government. That is absolutely incorrect. It is a clear misconception of the law.

The law specifically provides that the United States Housing Authority located in Washington will lend 90 percent of the cost of a project. The other 10 percent must be put up by the local authority; and unless and until the 10 percent is put up by the local authority no contract for housing will be made.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator realize that the 10 percent is not necessarily put up by the city? The local housing authority is authorized to issue and sell bonds in order to raise the 10 percent; and before the 10 percent of bonds is sold the housing authorities require some definite commitment from responsible banks or bankers that they will buy the 10 percent of bonds. The reason they are going to buy the 10 percent of bonds is that the amendment to the Federal Housing Act provides that the Federal subsidy payments shall be security for the payment of the interest on the 10 percent of bonds.

Mr. ELLENDER. Section 9 of the act specifically provides as follows:

The Authority may make loans to public-housing agencies to assist the development, acquisition, or administration of low-renthousing or slum-clearance projects by such agencies. Where capital grants are made pursuant to section 11 the total amount of such loans outstanding on any one project and in which the Authority participates shall not exceed the development or acquisition cost of such project less all such capital grants, but in no event shall said loans exceed 90 percent of such cost.

That is the amount which the U.S. H. A. here in Washington agrees to lend. Before the contract is entered into, it is necessary that the people locally interested shall lend 10 percent to the local authority.

Mr. TAFT. But, referring to the expression, "where capital grants are made," the U.S. H. A. has not pursued the theory of making any capital grants. It has pursued the alternative theory of providing subsidies; and under the amendment to section 10 it is provided that-

Payments under annual contribution contracts shall be pledged as security for any loans obtained by a public housing agency

And the 10 percent is obtained through loans in that way. Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, in the following section of the act, section 10, provisions are made whereby local authorities are obligated to reduce the rents to such a figure that the person with a low income may have a suitable place to live at a reasonable sum per month.

Under the law, the Federal Government, in effect, subsidizes the lessees to the extent of about one-third of the amount that would be usually charged if the building were privately owned. The municipality, in effect, subsidizes the lessee for a sum not less than 20 percent of the annual contributions, which average about 16% percent of the entire rental charge. So the amount of subsidies for rentals advanced by the Federal Government in cash and contributed by the local authorities, either in cash or by tax exemption or tax remission, aggregates 50 percent of the entire amount of the rent.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator will find, however, that there are no cases in which the local authorities—the cities have put up any cash. They have in some cases provided land; they have in some cases provided tax exemption; but the 10 percent of the cost of construction to which the Senator is referring is money which the local authority is going to borrow from the public. It is going to be a second lien behind the Government's 90 percent; but the 10 percent is going to be secured on the Government's subsidy payments. Not only that, but the subsidy payments are going to pay the interest and sinking fund on the 10 percent of bonds, just as was stated by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings]

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, in all events the purpose of the subsidies is to make it possible for these slum dwellers to obtain living facilities at a price commensurate with their ability to pay. Subsidizing these projects by the Federal Government to the amount of about 3½ percent of the entire cost of the project, plus the tax remission that is made by the local authorities or the cash furnished, makes it possible to cut the normal rent in half. In other words, if the slum dwellers were to try to obtain the same facilities from private individuals, they would have to pay at least double what they would pay under the present plan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. From an examination of the testimony, as well as many publications critical of the organization, it seems to me that a considerable number of those who are to inhabit the buildings after they shall have been constructed will not be slum dwellers; they will be persons who perhaps have not lived in the slums, and they will be persons whose income is greatly in excess of that which was contemplated when the act was passed.

Mr. ELLENDER. That would be a direct violation of the law. I am not familiar with the periodicals or statements to which the Senator has referred, but it may be that the statements were with reference to the first project which was started under the P. W. A. In that case there was a grant; in fact, the Federal Government put up the entire amount, and based the rentals on 55 percent of the cost. In those cases, as well as in cases under the old Resettlement Administration, some homes were built at a cost far in excess of the amount the Government should have paid. But let us not compare that with what is presently being done under the U.S. H. A.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield? I apologize, and I will not ask him to yield if he prefers not to do so.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am perfectly willing to yield for any question, and I will gladly answer if I can.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that the $134,000,000 expended by the P. W. A. has been charged off as a complete loss, or substantially a loss.

Mr. ELLENDER. I should not make that statement unless I had the facts; and the truth of the matter is that the buildings which were put up by the Government under the P. W. A. are all being rented, and they are paying out.

Mr. KING. Then the information which I have received, and which is contained in part in periodicals, may be in error.

Mr. ELLENDER. Whoever wrote the story did not have the facts at hand.

Mr. KING. One other question: My understanding is that the Government was to erect buildings so cheaply that those who occupied them would be able to pay a reasonable rent. As I understand the Senator, he is contending that in addition to building very cheap houses for the occupants, the Government is further to subsidize the enterprise by paying a part of the rent.

Mr. ELLENDER. As a matter of fact, the Government is not putting up the buildings. Local authorities, created under State laws, borrow the money and enter into contracts to build projects upon certain conditions and stipulations made to them by the U. S. H. A. here in Washington.

Mr. KING. The Government guarantees the bonds.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. KING. So, after all, the Government is putting up the money.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Government guarantees the bonds; it is making its credit available but the money is to be repaid to the purchasers of the bonds out of rentals to be collected from the occupants of the buildings.

Another question was raised by the Senator from Maryland and that is with respect to the cost of these housing units.

I desire to read, for the benefit of the Senator, from a statement of the actual per unit cost on about 50 projects. This is not guesswork; these figures are based upon contracts which have been entered into for the building of certain projects, contracts which have been bonded for faithful performance, and where the cost cannot be in excess of the agreed amounts.

First let us take Daytona Beach, Fla. The total contract price for the project, the over-all cost, which includes the cost of the land, the cost of the house, plumbing, heating, and electrical installation, including the cost of the dwelling equipment, such as gas stoves, electric refrigerators, and things of that kind the entire cost per unit, is $2,865.

Jacksonville, Fla., $4,272.

Miami, Fla., $4,230.

Remember, under the law, in cities of less than 500,000 inhabitants the limitation is $4,000 per dwelling unit, exclusive of the cost of the land. In many of the projects I am citing the land, building, and all facilities which I have indicated, cost less than the minimum provided for in the law.

St. Petersburg, Fla., $3,740 per unit.

Tampa, Fla., $3,732.

Augusta, Ga., $4,048. Another in Augusta, $4,167.

Columbus, Ga., $3,236.

Kokomo, Ind., $4,020.

Louisville, Ky., $4,872. Another in Louisville, $4,831. New Orleans, $5,163. Another in New Orleans, $4,849. Annapolis, Md., $4,135.

Omaha, Nebr., $4,582.

In Buffalo, in the State of New York, the cost is $4,670. Syracuse, $5,326.

Utica, $4,535.

The average cost for the 50 projects referred to in the statement was $4,731. I will not read the entire statement at this time. I will submit it for the Record sometime later. Ample evidence was produced at the hearings to show that the average unit cost of the various projects built or in process of building throughout the country, and on which contracts have been entered into, amounts to $4,507.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. BYRD. Does the figure the Senator has given include the cost of the land and the cost of demolishing the old buildings?

Mr. ELLENDER. The only item left out of the cost is the item of demolishing the old buildings, and that amounts to about 7 percent of the entire cost, as I recall.

Mr. BYRD. There is a limitation of $1,000 a room, or $4,000 a unit. The Senator now says the average cost is $4,700 a unit.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is exclusive of the land, which, by the way, was provided for in the amendment offered by the Senator, as I recall. The limitation of $4,000 in cities of under 500,000 inhabitants, and of $5,000 in cities above 500,000 inhabitants, was exclusive of the cost of the land.

Mr. BYRD. What is the average number of rooms?
Mr. ELLENDER. From 4 to 6 rooms. The way the number of rooms is figured depends upon the size of them.

Mr. BYRD. Would it not be more accurate to give the number of rooms, because the Senator has taken an average of some three-room units, some four-room units, and some five-room? The Senator says the average of all of them is $4,700, not including the cost of demolishing the old buildings. That would make it more than $1,000 a room.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have here a statement of the average cost in cities of under 500,000 inhabitants. The cost per room is $828, and in cities over 500,000 inhabitants the average cost is $940.

Mr. BYRD. What does the Senator include as a room? Does he include the living room, or the kitchen, or the bathroom? How does he figure the rooms?

Mr. ELLENDER. The bathroom, depending on its size, may be counted as half a room. A kitchen, depending on its size, may be classed as a third of a room, or three-quarters of a room.

Mr. BYRD. Who does the classifying?

Mr. ELLENDER. The local authority and the United States Housing Authority, when the contract is entered into.

Mr. BYRD. They can class them about as they please, then. In other words, if they are to determine by the size of the room as to whether it shall be classed as a full room or not, then it is left to them virtually to say whether the limitation of $1,000 a room shall be effective or not.

Mr. ELLENDER. But it is figured on an average basis. In building one's own home that may cost $50,000, let us say, the living room may cost $6,000 and the kitchen may cost $500, and----

Mr. BYRD. As I understand the Senator, he admits that on an average the cost is $4,700 per unit.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is on these 50 projects included in the statement I read from awhile ago.

Mr. BYRD. These are data the Senator has presented to the Senate, and his figure does not include the cost of demolishing the buildings.

Mr. ELLENDER. No.

Mr. BYRD. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the average cost to a private citizen who builds his own home in one of the cities of this country is only $3,800? In other words, these slum-clearance projects are costing $1,000 more per family unit than the average home in the average city, and far more than the average in the country districts?

Mr. ELLENDER. Where did the Senator obtain his infor-

Mr. BYRD. I got it from the Bureau of the Census.

Mr. ELLENDER. It is my understanding that in the Bureau of the Census figures the only costs which are included are the costs of the dwellings, and the totals do not include the cost of the land.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is not correct about that. Furthermore, the Senator has not included the total cost in his own figures, because he has omitted the cost of demolishing the old buildings.

Mr. ELLENDER. That amounts to about 7 percent of the over-all cost of the project. If a project costs $3,000, the demolishing cost would be $210.

Mr. BYRD. The fact remains that slum clearance in this country is costing more than the average home built by the average citizen for his own home.

Mr. ELLENDER. I doubt the correctness of that statement.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from New York. Mr. WAGNER. An analysis made of the figures of the F. H. A., together with the figures of the U. S. H. A., shows that the cost of the unit dwelling constructed under United States Housing Administration, although in some cases the houses are constructed in congested areas where the cost is pretty high, is a thousand dollars less than the average cost under F. H. A.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator from New York must also bear in mind that the slum-clearance projects are constructed in unit dwellings, and I am comparing them with the average cost of an individual unit. How many families, on an average, would be in these projects? In other words, it is a continuous dwelling, is it not?

Mr. ELLENDER. How many persons are housed?

Mr. BYRD. No; how many family units are there in one project?

Mr. ELLENDER. I would not be able to answer that question specifically. I will be glad to obtain the information for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. BYRD. The cost should be substantially less, with the houses constructed in that form, than in the case of an individual house, which is not adjacent, usually, to another dwelling.

Mr. ELLENDER. It does cost less. The figures show that the cost, as the Senator from New York has just stated, is in the neighborhood of a thousand dollars less per family unit.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator from New York has given figures of the United States Housing Administration. I will tomorrow present figures of the United States Department of Commerce and the Bureau of the Census, to show that these slum clearances are costing more than the cost of the average citizen's house.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the figures show the over-all cost, including street facilities?

Mr. BYRD. When I present them I will state exactly what they include, for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. ELLENDER. And do they include the cost of playgrounds, the cost of the land, the cost of nondwelling facilities, architect's fees, cost of dwelling equipment, cost of the building itself? Those are items which I should like to have included in any statement the Senator may present, so as to have a fair comparison.

Mr. BYRD. I shall endeavor to make it just as clear as the Senator from Louisiana is making his explanation of the cost of the units.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have had occasion to examine some of the houses that have been constructed with F. H. A. loans. They are usually individual houses with little plots of ground. Obviously we would presume that they would cost more than the slum-clearance houses or houses which are built in situations where several houses are conjoined, but I am not sure as to the cost.

Mr. ELLENDER. Houses built on individual plots of ground do cost more. Houses built under F. H. A. loans are built by individual home owners. They borrow the money from local banks under certain conditions.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. ELLENDER. And the banks guarantee repayment of the amount borrowed. The conditions confronting those home builders are entirely different from those faced by the persons proposed to be reached by the pending bill. The bill proposes to take care of a different class of people. Here we have people who cannot finance homes, who are unable to do so. They are obliged to rent houses.

Mr. KING. I understood it was contended by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Ellender]—I may be in error in assuming that that was their interpretation—that houses which were built under the guaranties of the F. H. A. cost more than those constructed otherwise.

Mr. ELLENDER. The per unit cost under United States Housing ranges from $800 to $1,000 less. That is my understanding.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not true that the F. H. A. average figures include all houses up to $20,000 houses? If so, it seems to me the comparison between the different costs would hardly be useful in this controversy.

Mr. ELLENDER. I believe the F. H. A. provides a limitation as to the amount to be spent for an individual home.

Mr. TAFT. The limitation is $20,000?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; $20,000. In those cases, of course, all classes of houses that are built under F. H. A. loans are necessarily taken into consideration.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

IIr. WAGNER. We also considered the locality in which the houses are to be constructed; that in some localities houses can be constructed at a lower cost than in others.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taft] himself recognized that fact when early in the session he introduced and secured the passage of a measure—and properly so, and I was delighted to vote for the bill—by which a certain district outside of Cincinnati was included in the metropolitan area of that city. The bill provided for the inclusion in such metropolitan area a housing project in order that the projects there may come within that provision of the act which provides for a higher cost per unit rather than the lower cost provided in the act. The Senator from Ohio himself recognized that under the then limitations of the act the slum-clearance project could not have been constructed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the purpose of the pending bill is to provide authority for the issuance of more bonds in order to keep on with the work that was started under the original Housing Act. It will be recalled that under the original Housing Act it was provided that the Housing Authority would have the right to sell $800,000,000 of bonds in order to carry out slum clearance. The amount of money provided in the act for subsidizing rents was fixed at $28,000,000. The bill originally provided for $35,000,000. Because of this reduction the Housing Authority was able to contract for but $650,000,000, thereby leaving a sum of $150,000,000 still available. The pending bill provides for a sufficient amount in subsidies so that contracts may be entered for said balance.

The law provides that the Government may be obligated to subsidize low-rent projects in a sum equal to the going Federal rate of interest plus 1 percent. That amount of subsidy figures in the neighborhood of $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent of the entire cost of the project.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The previous authorization was $800,000,000, was it not?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Another $800,000,000 is now being asked for.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. How many families does the Senator think the total authorizations of $1,600,000,000 would cover?

Mr. ELLENDER. According to estimates, 402,000 families. Mr. BYRD. How many families does the Senator think occupy buildings which would be classified as slums?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not know. I do not think anyone knows the number of persons living in slums. I know of no investigation made to ascertain the number.

Mr. BYRD. What is the estimate of the cost to carry the program to its logical conclusion and eliminate all the slums?

Mr. ELLENDER. I believe that question was propounded to Mr. Straus by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taft], and Mr. Straus could not give an answer. It was impossible for him to give an answer because, since the present law was enacted, there has been a gradual decrease in the per unit cost. If this decrease in per unit cost continues it may be that the subsidies—in fact I do not think, I know that the subsidies will be materially decreased. It is estimated that under the present contracts as made between the United States Housing Authority and the local authorities that the average cost to the Government per family is about $115. There is not included, however, the slum-clearance cost of demolition. That amounts to about, as I said awhile ago, 3 percent of the entire cost.

Mr. BYRD. I thought the Senator said 7 percent.

Mr. ELLENDER. Seven percent of the entire cost; yes.

Mr. BYRD. My recollection is that when Mayor La-Guardia came before the committee he said that the cost to New York City alone would be approximately $15,000,-000,000 to eliminate slums. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ELLENDER. I am not familiar with the statement made by Mr. LaGuardia. I doubt that it will require such a sum if only the low-income group is provided for.

I ask that the table to which I have referred, giving the costs of new housing for 48 projects, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

LOAN OF PORTRAIT OF GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT TO VIRGINIA MILITARY INSTITUTE

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Library I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 286, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 286) to provide for the lending to the Virginia Military Institute of the equestrian portrait of Gen. Winfield Scott now stored in the Capitol was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Architect of the Capitol is authorized and directed to permit the Virginia Military Institute to remove from the Capitol the equestrian portrait of Gen. Winfield Scott, to transport such portrait to Lexington, Va., and to have custody of such portrait until such time as the Architect of the Capitol shall request its return to the Capitol. The United States shall be subject to no expense by reason of the enactment of this joint resolution.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

UNVEILING OF WILL ROGERS STATUE-RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, several Members of the Senate have suggested the propriety of taking a recess in order that the Senate may attend the ceremonies in connection with the unveiling of the statue to Will Rogers in the rotunda of the Capitol. It is evident that many Senators are already there. Under the circumstances, I feel that it would be proper to take a recess at this time until tomorrow, if the Senator from Louisiana, in charge of the bill, is willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. ELLENDER. I shall be glad to yield if I may have the floor tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now stand in recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon, and that on tomorrow the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Ellender], in charge of the bill, shall be recognized to continue his address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 7, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 6, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we give Thee thanks for the blessed gift of life. With us may our great purpose be to live wisely, labor industriously, and at the last hand it back to God without the sense of shame. We beseech Thee to keep us in harmony with Thy plans. In this yearning world we pray for a sense of incompleteness. Help us to stress the unrealized, and thus grow in knowledge and in wisdom. Fill up the open spaces in our characters with those fine aspirations and loves that will never die out. Blessed Father, let the sweet harmonies of peace, good will, and Christian fraternity bless our entire country and rest like a divine benediction everywhere. In our dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 5610. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. J. Res. 138. Joint resolution providing that reorganization plans Nos. I and II shall take effect on July 1, 1939.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 572) entitled "An act to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense."

INCREASING THE PENALTY FOR ESPIONAGE

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Record of yesterday, June 5, page 6606, roll call No. 86, indicates that I did not vote. My reason for not voting was that it was necessary for me to be absent temporarily from the Chamber in attendance at the Supreme Court for the purpose of moving the admission of a member of the Omaha, Nebr., bar to practice before the Supreme Court.

The bill under consideration—H. R. 6075—was one to increase the penalty for espionage, reported out by the Committee on the Judiciary. In the deliberations of the committee I favored the bill. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the calling of the Private Calendar today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record in support of H. R. 6616, a bill introduced to erect a suitable monument at Abingdon, Va., in memory of Gen. William Campbell and his Virginia comrades in the Battle of Kings Mountain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a proposed amendment to the Social Security Act and a short table showing the results of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on two different subjects and to include in one a letter from the president of the World War Combat Veterans Association and in the other a short patriotic statement by one of my own constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a resolution adopted by the United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America on the question of the reorganization of the railroads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection. .

THE LATE HONORABLE HENRY U. JOHNSON

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to announce the death of a former Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I rise to report the death of the Honorable Henry U. Johnson, of Richmond, Ind., who represented the Sixth Congressional District of Indiana in the House of Representatives during the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses. His death occurred on Sunday, the 4th day of June 1939.

Henry U. Johnson was an outstanding citizen of Indiana; his attainments were great. He was a learned man and his life was devoted to study. The service he rendered in the National House of Representatives was distinguished, dignified, and outstanding. He was a man of sound and mature judgment and he analyzed the problems confronting him quickly and keenly; he was an orator of great ability. These qualities made him a worthy antagonist in every public forum.

The greater period of his active life was spent by him in the practice of his chosen profession—the law. He had but few peers as a general practitioner of his profession. As an advocate he presented his premises with clarity and irresistible force, and as a trial lawyer, in which wit and a profound knowledge of the law are essential, he was a marked leader in his State.

Throughout his long and useful life he evidenced a keen interest in every worth-while community development. While he attained the ripe age of 88 years, his deep interest in every worthy civic enterprise did not wane. He kept abreast of his time; and but a very short period of time before his death he participated actively in the trial of an important case in his local court. His activities in life continued to the very end.

Mr. Speaker, in the life of our distinguished colleague of former years, whose devotion to duty was his watchword, whose deep interest in all public questions did not dim with the lapse of years, whose unfaltering energy ever buoyed him up to meet the exigencies of life, we can truly say of him, "This was a man!"

While we say farewell to him, his works will inspire us throughout the years to come.

ANNOUNCING DEATH OF FORMER MEMBERS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I want again to call the attention of the House to one practice that ought to be followed by all means, and that is the practice followed by the gentleman from Indiana of announcing the death of a former Member of this House, and always to give the date of the death.

I had a good deal of experience in helping secure data for the last large Biographical Congressional Directory, published in 1927. We found that there were really hundreds of men, some of the finest men who have ever been Members of Congress, the dates of whose deaths could not be ascertained.

It takes but a moment; and I hope from now on every Member of the House who hears of the death of a former Member of Congress will take time to announce the death to the House or get someone else to do so and give the date of the former Member's passing, in order that it may be kept for the record in the years to come.

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS WHEAT, COTTON, AND DAIRY PRODUCTS Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a few days before my lamented colleague from New York, Hon. Bert Lord, departed this life he had prepared for introduction a bill authorizing the distribution of surplus wheat, cotton, and dairy products through the American National Red Cross and other organizations designated by it to needy and distressed people.

This bill, the purpose of which was so near the heart of my colleague, Mr. Lord, I am introducing today, as I feel that he would want me to do. It demonstrates his humanitarianism in a practical way as hardly anything else could do; and with the subject on his mind and heart and almost his last earthly thought, nothing could render him greater honor nor be a more fitting memorial to him than the enactment of this bill upon the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture, of which he was an honored and valuable member.

The bill would accomplish the twofold purpose of relieving the poor and needy and the reduction of surplus food and cotton.

REPUBLICAN BUBBLE IS BADLY PUNCTURED

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the gentleman from Indiana announced the death of a former Republican Member of this House. I do not rise for a like purpose, but to announce the death of the false hopes and inspirations of the Republican Party.

Yesterday elections were held in many Illinois counties and in the city of Chicago, and notwithstanding the ridiculous prophecies of the Republican leaders of Chicago in foolishly heralding a Republican victory by at least 80,000, I wish to impart to them the sad news that the Democrats carried Chicago by a majority of 3 to 1, and a majority of $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 in Cook County. When all returns are compiled, the actual majority may reach 400,000. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, as the Republicans claimed this election was a forerunner of the 1940 election—and I believe it is—I am satisfied that they will attain the same victories that they did in 1932, 1934, and 1936—yes, even in 1938, because I find that the people are just as strong now for Democracy and for President Roosevelt as they were in those former years. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

RESULTS OF ELECTIONS IN ILLINOIS

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Arends]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, following what the gentleman from Illinois has just said, may I state that in my district in yesterday's election we supplanted three Democratic judges with three Republicans. Down-State we picked up approximately 15 such offices. That should answer my colleague's statement as to what will happen in 1940 in Illinois.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 214 and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLARK] yield for that purpose?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Pierce]?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I noticed in connection with the reorganization of our governmental affairs a short time ago that the Farm Credit Administration was going to be put under the Secretary of Agriculture. We who represent agricultural districts, in which there are many foreclosures, rejoiced. I notice, however, that a few days ago the former Governor of the Farm Credit Administration came to the National Capital and now, lo and behold, we do not know where the Farm Credit Administration is going to be placed, nor have we any hope of its regeneration.

I received a letter containing a few lines of poetry which illustrate the sadness of farm foreclosures, as well as the need for old-age assistance. It is so beautifully expressed, and so true to life, thousands in similar situation will appreciate it.

It reads as follows:

GASTON, OREG., April 21, 1939.

Hon. Walter M. Pierce, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Just to think about, we send poetry:

Yes; Ed and I homesteaded This land when we were young; Still somehow we clung. Though none thought we'd hang to the claim,

We cleared it and we tilled it, Set out every tree; In each square foot of soil there is A lot of Ed and me.

Work was work those early days, With many stock to feed; But Ed and I, we managed; Folks do, when there is need.

Then of a sudden, strangely, Prices began to slide; The depression was upon us, But nowhere could we hide.

All alone, we must manage This humble valley ranch; Our youth plowed in each furrow, Fruiting on each branch.

Mortgaged foreclosed "get out"! They say Justice is cold and blind, But we can't quit and move away; We'd leave our hearts behind.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. and Mrs. E. E. MORGAN.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Pierce]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Clark] yield?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bender]?

There was no objection.

W. P. A. APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, in my home State of Ohio there are many people being laid off W. P. A. at this time. This has been going on for about a month, and there seems to me to be no logical excuse for this procedure. I believe there is sufficient money available to take care of all those on W. P. A. Somebody is playing politics with W. P. A.

Mr. Speaker, the administration certainly owes it to this Congress to give us a report as to the status of its finances at this time. We deserve to know exactly what the situation is. We followed the majority leadership in the matter of giving necessary appropriations to W. P. A., but Colonel Harrington has not given us any information from that time until the present to indicate that he needs additional money. If he does need it, we ought to be told about it, and we ought to provide for that need.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to answer the gentleman who just spoke.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield any more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLARK] refuses to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 214.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 214

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6635, a bill to amend the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 8 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor].

Mr. Speaker, I yield at this time 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sabath].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 214 is for consideration of the bill H. R. 6635, to amend the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, and provides 8 hours' general debate. It is an open rule, which will give all Members the opportunity to offer amendments and obtain a vote on any and all amendments that may be offered in good faith by any Member.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. Doughton], and other members of that committee, will explain the bill in detail, so I will content myself with mentioning that it extends and liberalizes benefits to widows, children, and dependent parents, and takes effect in 1940 instead of in 1942. The old-age insurance tax has been frozen at 1 percent upon workers as well as upon employers until 1942, which represents a 33-percent reduction. In the 3 years, 1940, 1941, and 1942, approximately $825,000,000 will thus be saved the employers and employees. Other savings provided for will bring the total savings to approximately $1,710,000,-000. It will also be seen that old-age insurance will be increased from $30 to $40 a month. The report of the committee, which I have before me, explains the many benefits under this act, and I hope that the chairman or some member of the Ways and Means Committee will place part of that report in the RECORD in order that the country may realize the great deal of time and study they have given the subject and the excellent recommendations they have brought forth.

I myself experienced a great deal of satisfaction and pleasure in having this bill before the House today. Over 30 years ago I introduced the first resolution to inquire into the possibilities of old-age insurance and advocated such insurance and legislation similar to that now provided in the Social Security Act. When we passed the first Social Security Act I said on the floor of the House that it was only a beginning, but a step in the right direction. I was mainly interested then in the principle, not the details. It is a principle I have advocated for many, many years.

Personally I cannot understand why 8 hours' general debate was requested. It is beyond me how anyone here with the interest of the people at heart can oppose any of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, it was known that the Ways and Means Committee was nearly ready to submit its report on this legislation, and as far as I was personally concerned I felt it decidedly out of place to bring the so-called Townsend bill to the floor of the House. That bill had no chance of passing in the first place; neither was it feasible nor possible of operation. Without charging that its proponents and supporters have ulterior motives, which I do not want to imply, it does seem to me that such legislation is built on dreams and impossible to work out. I venture to say that many of the Members who voted for it did so not from conviction but because of political expediency. It should be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that many of us Democrats advocated and worked for social security, old-age and unemployment insurance, long before Dr. Townsend was ever heard of. And let us not forget that it was under the aggressive leadership of President Roosevelt that the present Social Security Act became a law.

To get back to the bill before us, I feel that every Member who voted against the Townsend bill should demonstrate by his vote today that he is sincere in trying to better the condition of the Nation's needy. I do believe that if nothing had been accomplished by the administration other than this legislation, the President and the Democratic House would be entitled to the everlasting thanks and gratitude of the American people. [Applause.]

I hope that, notwithstanding the misleading statements that have been made and probably will continue to be made from time to time, the American people will appreciate this legislation as a step in the right direction.

I believe that nearly all the Members on both sides of the aisle are for this legislation and for this rule, and for that reason I am not going to take up the 10 minutes given me. I will conclude in the hope not only that all the time provided for debate will not be needed, but that not even half of the time will be taken up, as we have many important measures pending in which the House and the country are very interested.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield, of course. I never can refuse to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman says this is a step in the right direction, in changing the Social Security Act. Does not the gentleman believe you would have taken a greater step in the right direction had you given more time to the drafting of this act in its beginning? Then you would not have to make a lot of changes now. You are not even going far enough now to make it right. You ought to go a good bit further than you have gone at the present time.

Mr. SABATH. I am surprised, though also pleased, with the gentleman's question and suggestion. It does seem, though, that the gentleman today is at variance with his usual position. The gentleman suggests that we go much further than we are going in this bill. I agree that we should. But I recall quite vividly the gentleman's oft-repeated question, "Where will the money come from?" and I now ask that question of him. [Laughter and applause.]

I might inform the gentleman that originally we had hoped to make this bill a broader one, but the tremendous opposition from the Republican side kept us from giving the people all the relief we had hoped and expected to give them. However, we are doing it gradually, surely, positively, and in an orderly manner so as to not put a great additional strain on the Treasury or the taxpayers of the country.

The gentleman must be familiar with the cry of certain well-organized groups to the effect that taxes are stifling business. They want tax reductions. Of course they do. And I can take one very loud mouthpiece of those vested interests, the Chicago Tribune, and read to you headlines from some of its recent editions, which just do not support the editorials appearing in the same issue. Here is one headline:

Four hundred companies' net earnings 82 percent higher.

That appeared in the finance and commerce section of the June 2 issue. It reports that the aggregate net income of these companies for the 3 months ending with March was $251,500,000, against $137,900,000 a year earlier. Another heading is:

June interest, dividends put at $579,119,000.

The edition of May 23 reports:

Commonwealth & Southern made $13,750,981—Eastern Air Lines increases income—$233,125 in the first quarter compares with earnings of $98,822 year before.

The May 20 edition reports:

Store sales in week 22 percent above year ago—May 1 supply of used autos shows upturn—Output of autos mounts against seasonal trend.

Mr. Speaker, all of these newspaper reports, mind you, are in a newspaper whose editorials are continually crying against the administration and this Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. The gentleman from Illinois is making a very fine speech. The gentleman discussed the Townsend plan. Will the gentleman state how he stands on the Townsend plan?

Mr. SABATH. I have been opposed to it. It cannot be adopted, except in a form that could never be carried out. The finances of the Nation will not permit it. As I stated before, long before Dr. Townsend was ever heard of, the President and the Democratic Members realized the necessity of doing something for the aged of the country. We started the social-security program and we are going to follow it through without the aid of Dr. Townsend or any others impractical enough not to face hard realities and realize that such plans as the one he advances is absurd.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I should like to ask this of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania: Since he says this bill does not go far enough, how much further would he want it to go and how much money would he want us to spend?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is asking me a question and I am sure the gentleman from Illinois will be pleased to hear me answer it. I will say, first, that the gentleman from Illinois is the first man I have heard on that side of the House get up and say, "Where are you going to get the money?" I congratulate the gentleman because I believe he is seeing the light. I believe if the gentleman will keep on he will realize that this program you have established cannot go any further because it is wrecking the Nation. I congratulate the gentleman. I think he is on the right track. I hope the gentleman can secure the aid and assistance of the Speaker, the majority leader, and the majority of the Members on that side of the House. I hope you will finish the job. The gentleman is the first man on that side who has started to want to know where you are going to get the money. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman. He is always very kind to me personally, and I appreciate it; but I could not resist asking that question, because the gentleman feels we are not going far enough. We are increasing the benefits and reducing the taxes. That certainly should satisfy the gentleman, who is always inquiring as to where the money is coming from. This bill in itself makes a reduction of $1,710,-000,000. In addition to that it should be recognized that the continued improvement of business, with higher profits, means increased revenue to the Government, and I am not a bit alarmed—nor should he be—as to where the money will come from. Further proof of what I say will be found in the following short article from the Chicago Times. I urge the gentleman from Pennsylvania and all those who charge that business is being retarded by the New Deal to read and study it:

MORE NEW DEAL "RUIN"

Lammot du Pont, president of the du Pont Co., recently addressed an open letter to employees and stockholders of his company attacking the New Deal, accusing it of producing "fear and a perpetuation of our difficulties." Government expenses and taxation were strongly assailed as holding back business and reemploy-

Mr. du Pont ought to know something about how taxation and the fear therefrom holds back business. In 1932 the du Pont Co. paid less than a million dollars in Federal taxes. In 1937 the company paid more than eleven millions in Federal taxes. And look at the earning record of the company:

1929	$78, 171, 730
1930	55, 962, 009
1931	53, 190, 059
1932	26, 234, 778
1933	38, 895, 330
1934	46, 701, 465
1935	62, 335, 410
1936	89, 884, 449
1937	88, 031, 943
1938	50, 190, 827

Those are net earnings after all taxes, including, in 1937, the atter an taxes, including, in 1937, the hated undivided surplus tax. And yet the du Pont Co. netted $62,000,000 more in 1937 than in 1932. It earned—net, mind you—eleven millions more in 1937 than in that grand and glorious boom year of 1929.

If "big business" wonders why nobody loves it, there is a lesson in the du Pont statement in the face of the du Pont earning record. It is so obvious that the disorders of the capitalistic system are so much deeper and more fundamental than taxation and Government spending that the public is disgusted when "captains of industry" persist in ignoring the plain facts in order to slam the New Deal.

Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues from Illinois a few moments ago stated that in his district three Republican judges were elected. That is true. We in Chicago are taking the judiciary out of politics. We nominated some Republican judges. If we had not nominated some Republican judges on the Democratic ticket our majority would have been still larger because people resented the fact that we had done so. Our Democratic majority will be close to 400,000 in the city of Chicago, and this will overcome the effect of any little election in some of the country towns down-State. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Coffee of Nebraska). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to consume a great deal of time in a discussion of this rule and the measure which it makes in order.

The bill, consisting of over 100 pages, is so complex and complicated that it would take the sapience of the proverbial Philadelphia lawyer and a great deal of actuarial knowledge to interpret its provisions.

There is one provision of the bill, however, with which I am more or less familiar by experience, and that is the section of the bill which relates to old-age assistance. When we had this measure before us on April 17, 1935, I took occasion to discuss the merits of that bill at that time. This was the original Social Security Act and on that occasion I made some predictions as to old-age assistance which have been verified by time. I said on that occasion:

According to the terms of this bill, the Government agrees to give According to the terms of this bill, the Government agrees to give those over 65 years of age a pension in such amount as may be matched up to $15 per month by the State in which such persons reside. Therefore only persons in those States that are financially able to meet this condition will be benefited by this legislation as now proposed. During the course of this debate it has been repeatedly asserted by representatives of what some are disposed to refer to as "backward" States that a large number of States are so beset with financial difficulties that it will be impossible for them to qualify for the benefits of this legislation. What a spectacle it would be, Mr. Chairman, for the Government to be taking care of the aged and helpless in one State while the same class of citizens were denied these benefits in another State, even an adjoining State. these benefits in another State, even an adjoining State.

I made this prediction when we had this bill under consideration in 1935 and what I said then has come true. There is never a day that I do not receive from one to a dozen appeals from old people in Tennessee who are endeavoring to get on the old-age pension roll, pleading with me to assist them in obtaining these benefits. Of course, under the law, this act is administered by State authorities and I do not happen to enjoy a great deal of influence with the State administration in Tennessee, and therefore I am unable to render much assistance to them, although I do attempt to do so whenever an appeal is made.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. RANKIN. What amount does an old person get under the present set-up in Tennessee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The average amount paid to the aged in Tennessee, as of February of this year, is $13.23.

Mr. RANKIN. Then this bill will not help them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. This bill will be of no benefit whatever to the State of Tennessee unless we adopt an amendment which I expect to propose. In the gentleman's State of Mississippi the average pension paid is $7.06 and it goes down as low as $6.11 in the State of Arkansas. So the States that have not the financial resources to meet the contribution made by the Government are actually in the position of contributing to the States that have sufficient resources to meet this old-age assistance obligation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand it, this bill raises the payment by the United States Government from $15 to $20.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Where the payment is matched by the several States?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. For instance, in my own State our contribution from the Federal Government amounts to only $10, because we can only contribute approximately $10 from the State and the counties.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And I cannot see where this bill, as it is now written, will in anywise help us in Montana, because we cannot raise the amount in Montana necessary to match the $20 provided in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I recognize that difficulty and at the proper time I expect to offer an amendment to meet it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What will be the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I shall propose an amendment providing that the Government shall contribute fiveeighths of the $40 which is provided for in this bill, which will leave the State contribution at $15 and make the Federal contribution $25.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Why do we not have a flat contribution by the Federal Government from Washington regardless of what the State can put up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. In my judgment we will never have a satisfactory old-age pension law until the pension is paid direct from Washington.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is right.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Because these States that are impoverished cannot meet the requirements of this bill.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I may say that in the State of Kentucky the average pension paid under the Social Security Act is less than $9, and many old people get as low as $6 or even as low as $4, and in Kentucky the director of old-age assistance has advised me and others recently that around 90,000 people have applied for old-age assistance, and they have allowed only about 45,000, while admitting there are thousands and thousands of persons qualified who cannot get any pension because no provision has been made for the payment of such pensions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I concede that what the gentleman says is true, because the same situation prevails in

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In 1935, when the Social Security Act was passed, I offered as an amendment a straight payment by the Federal Government to all needy old people. and the gentleman from Tennessee now speaking actively supported my amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman has an accurate memory. In Tennessee, in February, we had 21,946 people on old-age pension rolls, and I am reliably advised that in that month we had as many or more who had been pronounced eligible for old-age assistance who could not be placed on the rolls on account of insufficiency of funds.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LEAVY. The gentleman is evidently reading from a tabulation furnished him by the Social Security Board as to payments, and I am wondering if that tabulation discloses any State in the Union except California that is actually matching $15 a month at the present time?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. California is paying an average of $32.47, Colorado is paying an average of $29.07, and a number of States are paying $25 or more-Massachusetts, New York, I think Ohio, and at least a dozen other States.

Mr. LEAVY. But aside from this bill no other State is able yet to match dollar for dollar the $15?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. That is the reason the Government ought to grant a subsidy to the States to take care of this situation.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. PACE. With only one State now matching the $15, what was the idea of the committee in reporting $20, when only one State in the Union can really pay $15?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. It appears to be a delusion and a snare.

Mr. PACE. So it is working somewhat under the philosophy of the Biblical phrase that "To him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away."

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes; and as I pointed out to the gentleman from Georgia, his State is contributing to the other States because you have not been financially able to meet the provision requiring equal contribution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman support an amendment making this outright grant by the Federal Government?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes. I said a moment ago that I do not think we will ever have a satisfactory old-age pension law until it is paid by the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the statement just made by my distinguished colleague on the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. I did not know that he had any such proposition in mind, but I am glad to know that he has, because I know we are going to get some much-needed support from that side of the House.

When this social-security bill was first considered, I appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and pointed out that these so-called less wealthy States could not match this pension dollar for dollar. When that bill was considered on the floor of the House I offered an amendment that would have required the Federal Government to put up four-fifths of the money. That amendment was defeated and consequently the legislation that we now have was enacted. After 4 years of that legislation we have seen that the very fact that I pointed out to the committee and pointed out on the floor of the House has come true, namely, that these States cannot meet this money dollar for dollar. It is fine for California, it is fine for Massachusetts, but it is mighty bad for Arkansas, New Mexico, and Mississippi, and Georgia, and these other States that cannot match the $15.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not true that under the present proposed bill the people who are suffering most by reason of the fact that the States cannot match dollar for dollar are going to be in the identical same position if the legislation becomes a law.

Mr. COLMER. The gentleman is entirely correct. This bill does not help the needy of his State one dollar.

Mr. DEMPSEY. In other words the people who need help most are to receive no benefits by it.

Mr. COLMER. Quite so. Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Not only will this not benefit the old people in those States, what are called the poor States, but the poor States off which the other States have grown rich are agricultural States where the social-security part of this bill and the social-security part of the original bill left the farmers out of it entirely.

Mr. COLMER. Quite so.

Mr. RANKIN. So the only thing the people in the farming States get is the privilege of paying the bill?

Mr. COLMER. I thank my colleague for his contribu-tion. When this bill is considered under the 5-minute rule—and we have an open rule on this bill and will have an opportunity to legislate, as we did not have the other day—I will offer an amendment on page 3, line 9, to strike out "one-half" and insert "four-fifths"; on page 4, line 6, strike out "one-half" and insert "four-fifths"; and in line 15, strike out the word "forty" and insert the words "twenty-five."

That would do simply this: That would say that for every dollar that the States put up the Federal Government would match it by $4 up to the $20 limitation of the Federal Government. In other words, it would not cost the Federal Government one cent more as far as those States that are able to match it are concerned; but it would benefit the aged needy of the less wealthy States by increasing their present pittance by $4 for every dollar their State now contributes. The need of the aged in New Mexico is just as great as it is in California or Massachusetts.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Since I come from California I would like to say that I would be glad to support the gentleman's amendments.

Mr. COLMER. I appreciate the gentleman's statement. He is always fair and broad-minded.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. In just a moment. Not only that but let me call the attention of the gentleman from California to the fact that if my amendment is adopted the aged people of his State, which now matches the full $15 that the Federal Government puts up, will get $5 more per capita than they are now getting. In other words, they would get $20 for the $15 contributed where they are now getting $15 from the Federal Government.

I now yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. Under the gentleman's plan, as I understand it, if a State matched fully the $20, the maximum pension would be $25 per month.

Mr. COLMER. Oh, no, not at all. The maximum pension would be $40, as it is now written in the bill, where the State puts up $20.

Mr. LEAVY. But in order to get $20 from the Federal Treasury a State would only be required to put up $5?

Mr. COLMER. That is correct.

Mr. LEAVY. And that would make a $25 pension?

Mr. COLMER. Quite so.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In my State of Montana where the State and counties put up $10, under the gentleman's amendment, how much pension would go to my qualified people in Montana, assuming that they continue to put up the amount of money they are now advancing, namely, approximately $10?

Mr. COLMER. If they put up $10 they would get a maximum of $20 from the Federal Government. That would make a $30 pension.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is, under your proposed amendment?

Mr. COLMER. Under my proposed amendment; yes.

Now, let me say that we had before this House the other day a utopian scheme that would give people as much as $200 a month; $400 for an aged couple. This House, by an overwhelming vote, turned down that proposition, as was expected. Aged pensions are something new in our governmental scheme. I think it is cruel to attempt to lead these old people to believe that a $200 or $300 pension is an attainable goal. But I say to you that this question of pensions for the aged is one of the most pertinent questions, one of the most pressing questions that confronts this country today. I want to say to you further, you people from Massachusetts and California, if you think you are getting something out of this and the other States are not, let me remind you that if this thing continues you are going to have the same proposition in pensions for the aged that you now have in the W. P. A. and these other relief agencies.

You are going to have the aged and needy from those States that cannot match this proposition coming to your State to live with you, and you are going to have to take care of them. That is what is being done in the W. P. A. That is what is being done in the other relief agencies. We ask by this amendment that you treat the aged needy of these so-called less wealthy States not as well as they are treated in Massachusetts and California and some of the other States, but to give them a break; give them an opportunity to get something. They should in justice all receive the same treatment. In my own State of Mississippi it would require more money than all of the money that is now collected for general revenue purposes in the State of Mississippi, to match the proposition of $20 with $20. It is therefore apparent that it is impractical and not feasible for them to match it on an equal basis.

I want you to think seriously about this proposition, which I am advocating. It is something this House ought to consider and correct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention, in conclusion, to the fact that the Senate committee on relief and unemployment recognized the justice of this cause which I am advocating, in its report No. 2, part 1, submitted by Senator Byrnes on January 4, 1939, wherein it is stated:

In certain States this grant is so inadequate as to be of little value. It is recommended that the contribution of the United States for public assistance to the aged, the blind, and dependent children be 50 percent of the amount paid, but that in those States where the average per capita income is less than the average per capita income of the United States, the Federal contribution be increased in proportion to such differences, and that a provision of the grant should be the guaranty of certain minimum payments, as follows: To the aged, $15; to the blind, $15; to the dependent children, $20.

For the benefit of the membership and for their consideration between now and the time that we vote on the bill, I want to quote the amendment again, as follows:

Amendment: On page 3, line 9, strike out "one-half" and insert "four-fifths"; and in line 15 strike out the figure "40" and insert the figure "25"; and on page 4, line 6, strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fifth."

This report recommends a minimum to the aged of $15, to the blind $15, and to dependent children $20 as the Federal Government's contribution.

The President's Board recognized this principle in its report to the President which the President sent to this Congress with this statement:

The Board believes it is essential to change the present system of uniform percentage grants to a system whereby the percentage of the total cost in each State made through a Federal grant would vary in accordance with the relative economic capacity of that State.

Mr. Speaker, the following table graphically describes the unjust discrepancies in the amount received under the present set-up which this amendment would tend to equalize:

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I have given much thought and consideration to this subject. I was never more convinced of anything in my life than I am of the injustice of this set-up. Pensions for the aged needy will eventually be recognized as a national problem. We are not going that far here. We are merely asking for a little better treatment for those aged needy people who live in the less densely populated areas of the country. This is by no means as far as I would like to see the Congress go, but this is as far as I have any assurance or the right to feel that the Congress will go at this time. And so far as I am concerned, I would prefer to get something tangible like this than to render lip service to these poor aged people, as has been such a popular pastime with so many of our public people, and especially candidates for office. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] a few moments ago announced a famous New Deal victory in the city of Chicago. Like many others of these famous New Deal victories, however, if you analyze them you will find they are not victories at all. I am informed that in the city of Chicago a list of sitting judges were nominated, Republicans and Democrats alike. There were some 20 sitting judges, 7 of whom were Republicans. They were nominated and endorsed and ran on the Democratic ticket, and were supported by the Chicago Tribune, a Republican newspaper, and by hundreds of thousands of Republicans. If this be the type of New Deal victory you are depending upon to get back in 1940, it seems to me you will have to have a better basis and more effective propaganda work than that.

We Republicans are highly gratified that the Ways and Means Committee have finally come to the conclusion that the Republicans were right 2 or 3 years ago when we advocated the abandonment of the $47,000,000,000 reserve fund. We also are highly gratified that you have taken the Republican position which we proposed by way of a motion to recommit, to raise the pensions for needy aged, which you put in the bill from $15 to $20; so I congratulate you upon your Republican point of view, and I imagine you will have a pretty good bill after a while, a bill that will be satisfactory to the wage earners of the country. Recently you introduced and brought into the House the so-called Townsend plan under a gag rule that made it utterly impossible for the Members to amend the bill or to consider it in any way except to adopt or to reject it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from New York is a member of the Committee on Rules?

Mr. FISH. I am, unfortunately, a member of the minority of the Rules Committee. I objected strenuously to the gag rule, but was outvoted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it not a further fact that it lies within the discretion of the Committee on Rules to report any kind of rule, an open or a closed rule? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. FISH. Certainly; but I have just told the gentleman that I did all I could by voting against a closed rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Did the gentleman make any attempt to have reported an open rule?

Mr. FISH. Oh, yes. I advocated an open rule, and urged an open rule. I have always opposed gag rules.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Republicans would offer a motion to recommit this bill and bring it back with a $20 contribution by the Federal Government?

Mr. FISH. No; the gentleman misunderstood my statement. I stated that a number of years ago when the social-security bill was under consideration in the House the Republicans offered a motion to recommit for $20, which was defeated. Now, however, the Democratic Ways and Means Committee have adopted the old Republican motion; and, step by step, they are improving and perfecting the bill until some of these days we shall have a sound and workable bill. In view of the fact, however, that this whole question of old-age pensions was not discussed or debated except as to the actual text of the Townsend bill, the opportunity now arises for every Member of the House to express his or her views as to what an adequate old-age pension should be, or what the adequate old-age pension provision should be in this bill.

Listening to what has been said, you must come to the conclusion that certain States of the Union are practically insolvent or virtually bankrupt. When, therefore, we adopt even this $20 provision, it does no good in certain States, for they cannot afford to take advantage of it. It is a political hoax. You are not fooling the Townsendites, nor are you fooling the aged needy in the country. When the Congress of the United States raises this limit to $20 it does no good except in the State of California and one or two others. It certainly amounts to political trickery and a contemptible action as far as the needy aged are concerned.

We assume that we are legislating in good faith and desire to provide adequate old-age pensions. We Members of the House of Representatives have the power to legislate here today. We should consider all angles of the question. I am willing to accept two or three different amendments any one of which would be preferable to the present bill. I am willing to follow the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor], who advocated that the Federal Government pay five-eighths of the pension and that the States pay three-eighths. The purpose of his amendment is to encourage the States to do everything in their power to put up their three-eighths in order to get the five-eighths from the Federal Government.

In this way the needy aged will not be discriminated against in the poorer States of the Union. Whether those States happen to be Democratic States or not, it is a matter of sound common sense, justice, and fair dealing. I am willing to go even further; I am willing to support an amendment, or maybe to offer an amendment to get the will of the House on a flat pension of $10 to the needy aged in every State of the Union without discrimination, limiting it to the needy or qualifying it so that, for instance, it will not be paid to those who have more than $1,000 in real or personal property.

Mr. COLMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. I am interested in the gentleman's statement, although I am not sure I heard all of it. I understood that the gentleman favored the principle of giving the so-called poorer States an opportunity to pay a better pension by having the Federal Government pay better than on a 50-percent basis. I want to congratulate the gentleman upon his stand and I hope he may be supported.

Mr. FISH. I think the House has a right at this time under an open rule to work its will. It has this opportunity now. It cannot hide behind a gag rule if it wants to do something for the aged and needy of this country. The Ways and Means Committee has been very fair. It has raised the ante $5, but that does not mean this money will reach the aged in many States of the Union. I am not criticizing the Ways and Means Committee. We have the power here to amend and we cannot now hide behind a gag rule as was done when the Townsend bill was being considered.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman spoke about the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor] who advocates the payment of five-eighths by the Federal Government and three-eighths by the States. As an ultimate conclusion, why not say one-eighth by the States and seven-eighths by the Federal Government?

Mr. FISH. I think his proposition is fair and equitable. We are trying to be reasonable. If we follow the gentleman's suggestion, why not pay it all?

Mr. DISNEY. That is my next question.

Mr. FISH. I believe the States should pay a substantial part. I am willing, however, to provide a minimum flat pension of $10 to the needy aged, with some restrictions as to the definition of need.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DISNEY. Either proposition involves the final drifting to a Federal payment without State participation.

Mr. FISH. I am opposed to that. I think the States should pay something.

Mr. DISNEY. When you go further than a 50-50 proposition, are you not getting ready for ensuing concessions along that line?

Mr. FISH. I do not agree with that logic at all. We opened the gate on a 50-50 basis. When we did that we hoped it would work, and we thought the States would be able to contribute their 50 percent. The fact is the States have not been and are not able to contribute the 50 percent; therefore, we are willing to grant a further concession as an encouragement to those States in order that the needy of those States may be able to get the same treatment as the needy in other States. That is the purpose of any reasonable amendment along these lines, and it seems to me it is sound and logical, but we should not go the entire way by paying seven-eighths or nine-tenths or the whole thing.

Mr. DISNEY. Just one other question. Is it not an invitation to the States not to participate when we start stepping up?

Mr. FISH. No. It would be just the reverse. If we stepped it up to five-eighths and say to the States that they will have to put in three-eighths, that is an encouragement, because they get more than they put up. Any sensible businessman or any sensible State would like to do that if it can do so within its finances.

Mr. DISNEY. Does not the gentleman think the States have a right to decide how much they will put in?

Mr. FISH. I do; yes. I thoroughly agree with that. I do not believe in putting a limitation upon the States. If they want to put up a hundred dollars, that is their right. If California wants to vote a hundred-dollar pension, that is its right to do so. We should not dictate to the States what they should put up. As far as the three-eighths is concerned, they have to put up three-eighths in order to get five-eighths. There will be lots of other amendments offered. I am only speaking on the principle. Some people think we ought to put up two-thirds as opposed to one-third. As far as I am concerned, either one of those is satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a vote on another proposition, and I am going to offer it simply to get the will of the House. I refer to a flat minimum pension of $10 to be paid to the needy, with a limitation of $1,000 in personal and real property. I would like to have a vote on that. Then we can proceed to legislate along these lines. I am also in favor of lifting the $20 pension to $25. I have been in favor of the $25 pension for years. Again I want to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee on going to $20, but I am perfectly willing and ready to vote a $25 pension into this Social Security Act.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. If that plan is adopted, how soon will it be until $200 is offered as a flat pension for the entire United States, a proposal which we just voted down?

Mr. FISH. I think the matter of reasons

Mr. FISH. I think the matter of reasonableness enters into the picture there. We voted down the Townsend plan, and we voted against it because we did not believe in $200 a month, nor did we believe in the financial set-up. Many of us believe if you can give $20 you can give $25, which is certainly a reasonable proposition. According to the committee, it costs between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000 more to raise it from $20 to $25. That is all it costs. We appropriate $100,000,000 for a battleship without even discussing the proposition, yet we are afraid to appropriate $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 for the aged and needy of this country.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What benefit would a poor State or the people of a poor State get out of the gentleman's proposal if you increase the $15 to $25 when those States cannot now match the $15?

Mr. FISH. That is a perfectly proper question. That is why I propose to offer an amendment to pay a flat pension to all needy over 65 years of age with certain restrictions, so that it will be shown they are needy and not the welfare needy, of $10 a month.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Do not make it less than $20 a month. You cannot ask people to live on $10 a month.

Mr. FISH. I am not asking them to live on $10 a month. I am going by what the country can afford to do and what I think is the fair, humane, and just thing to do at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then make it $20.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. Voorhis].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss the social-security proposition at this time. I hope I shall have a few minutes to do that in the course of the debate. At this time I wish to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bender], who complained this morning that people were being laid off by the W. P. A. in his State. He blamed the administration for these lay-offs. But it ought not to be necessary to point out to any intelligent human being that the reason these people are being laid off is that the appropriation was in an amount sufficiently small that everybody knew it was going to be necessary to lay off some 200,000 people at the beginning of each month.

I merely wish to say that, in my opinion, the thing that would do more, perhaps, to restore real confidence to this country than anything else would be for this Congress to determine that every family that is totally unemployed would have an opportunity to have one person at work. Of course, consideration of matters such as the social-security program is evidently related to that. The better we can do in the matter of real old-age pensions the less necessity there will be for other types of legislation such as W. P. A. It is all connected together. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY].

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE THIRD-TERM MYTH

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, the American, by nature, is adventurous. Especially is this so as he seeks the life-giving waters of democracy. For greater freedom, he fears not experiment. To promote liberty, he abandons ancient vehicles impotent against the obstructions of a modernized social savagery.

The early Americans did not hesitate to forsake old loyalties, customs, and the homes of their fathers, for they held that the loyalty to themselves involved in freedom was their first loyalty. That their sons should live as free men was of greater consequence than that their fathers had died in the trappings of the king.

When the stagnation from which they fled crept across the seas, they fled no further, but tried a new policy—revolution—and dissolved all political ties to the past.

Traditions were gossamer when confronted by facts. "The king could do no wrong"—that was not only shibboleth but law. There came another lawmaker—the Continental Congress—and its first law was the Declaration of Independence, which not only decreed freedom as the law of the land but indicted the king as a public enemy, listing his crimes against God and mankind.

Kings then and kings now form a sharp contrast. The experiment of freedom achieved in 1776 has so well worked that the successor of the king who was outlawed is now a more than welcome guest to our shores, for he, too, subscribes to a democracy with a willing heart.

Our colonial forebears were not traditionalists or they would not have fought the king. We are not traditionalists, or we would not welcome George VI. As the founding fathers were realistic, they would expect us to be. Traditions that denied them development, they ignored; and as their adventurous descendants, so should we.

Today we are confronted with tradition, born of a myth. Were it true tradition, but an impediment to our growth, as a practical people, we would assign it no value. The so-called third term tradition has not the weight of tradition. It has been ascribed to Washington, but his own words dispel the myth that Washington believed a Presidential third term unpatriotic.

Even today our school children are taught, among other legendary stories about the Father of his Country, that it was he, who, through patriotic reasons, laid down the rule that two terms were sufficient for any person to serve as Chief Executive of the United States. He did not want to accept a second term, but foreign affairs were in such a state that he did. In his Farewell Address on September 17, 1796, Washington recalled the circumstances, and he went on to say:

Not unconscious, in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services, they were temporary. I have the consolation to believe, that while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

Washington wanted to retire from political life to the retreat of his Virginia estate. Domestic conditions were tranquil and there was no necessity, he held, for him to again accept election to the presidency.

There has also been some confused thinking as to Jeffer-son's attitude on a third term.

The historian McMaster, who wrote that Washington went back to private life solely because he was tired of the Presidency, and because the state of the country did not demand a further sacrifice of his comfort, also discovered a personal letter Jefferson wrote to his friend, Colonel Taylor, of Virginia, from Washington, and dated January 6, 1805.

My opinion originally was-

Wrote Jefferson-

that the President of the United States should have been elected for 7 years and be forever ineligible afterward. I have since become sensible that 7 years is too long to be irremovable, and that there should be a peaceable way of withdrawing a man in midway who is doing wrong. The service for 8 years with a power to remove at the end of the first 4 comes nearly to principle as corrected by experience. And it is in adherence to that that I determine to withdraw at the end of my second term.

Then he added this qualification:

There is, however, but one circumstance, which could engage by acquiesce in another [a third] election, to wit, such a division about my successor as might bring in a monarchist.

So Mr. Jefferson, in order to prevent the election of a person committed to views or principles which Jefferson believed prejudicial to the interests of the country, would have stood for a third consecutive term.

That important qualification, Professor McMaster noted, was never included in any of Mr. Jefferson's public utterances. But after waiting more than a year without replying to the invitation of the Legislature of Vermont, and followed by addresses from the Legislatures of Georgia, Maryland, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and North Carolina urging Mr. Jefferson to become a candidate for a third successive term, Mr. Jefferson replied as follows:

That I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will in fact become for life; and historians show how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government responsible at short periods of election is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the first person, who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, would furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office.

Jefferson's biographer, Nock, said that Jefferson at the closing of his second term wrote an importunate correspondent—

You suppose I am "in the prime of life for rule." I am sensible I am not and before I am so far declined as to become insensible of it, I think it right to put it out of my own power.

By means of the congressional caucus, Jefferson passed the Presidency on to Madison, Jefferson's Secretary of State, and then, after Madison served two terms, Jefferson and Madison together gave the Presidency to Monroe, Madison's Secretary of State. That caucus system was not crushed until 1824.

That Washington could have been elected to a third term, but would not have it, is best proof that our early citizens did not oppose a third term. Washington's reasons for not running a third time were purely personal and did not beget a national policy.

The Constitutional Convention did not adopt any bars to a third term. The far-seeing sages who contrived the Constitution thought the time might come and the man might come when such a bar would impede the progress of the

The third-term phase of our political life did not appear again until 1880 when Grant went to a Republican convention with 302 votes. Other considerations made him unavailable as a candidate.

Mr. Coolidge, by his silence in 1927, created probably the greatest furor in American politics-until the present. Editorial pens and typewriters, somber and facetious expressions in the Senate, further perplexed the average citizen.

One of the most learned men who ever sat in the Senate was the late Senator Fess, of Ohio, a former educator. In debate on the La Follette resolution on February 9, 1928, Senator Fess pointed out that the Constitutional Convention was unable to agree on the tenure of the President.

When the question arose in reference to the Chief Executive-the convention originally proposed a term of 7 years, with ineligibility for reelection. When a vote was called upon that proposal Washington was included in the list of those who voted against it. Although he did not make any comment at the time, later on, as is well understood, Washington had a conversation with Jefferson on the matter, and they did not agree. Also Washington wrote a reply to General Lafayette, who specifically addressed a letter to Washington on the subject of ineligibility to reelection. In the reply of General Washington he took a decided position against the Jeffersonian view. So it was decided not to limit tenure. The Constitutional Convention did fix a short term, but kept open the question of tenure, so that if experience might count for anything it could be utilized in the administration of the Government.

Further in his discourse, Senator Fess said:

Custom thus far has limited the tenure of the Executive to two terms. That may have the force of law, but there is no constitutional inhibition against extending the term of the Executive beyond the second term. There is no inhibition whatever, as every student of constitutional law must recognize. Neither is there any inhibition in regard to the Members of this body or the Members of the House of Representatives.

I admit that the precedent (of a second term) was set by Washington. I admit that he was not elected to a third term; but I will not admit that he believed that a third term was vicious or that he ever thought it was unpatriotic, or that he thought it would not be a wise course.

There was not any doubt of his intention to retire at the end of the first term, even though he might have changed his views about retiring before the term was over. He stated to Madison that he wanted an address prepared suitable to his retirement. Madison put it into form. In that address I find these words, which are constantly quoted by the proponents of this resolution as being words of Washington:

"May I be allowed further to add as a consideration far more important than an early example for rotation in office of so high and delicate a nature may equally accord with the republican spirit of our Constitution and the ideas of liberty and safety entertained by the people."

Rotation in office! That is stated as being in accord with our views of democratic government.

Mr. President, that statement was written by Madison. That statement was not in the President's Farewell Address when the finally delivered it to the American people. This particular item of Madison's draft was never accepted by President Washington.

On the next day, February 10, 1928, Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen, the RECORD shows Senator Wesley L. Jones, of Washington, another stanch Republican, saying to the

The passage of the resolution, in my judgment, amounts to nothing more than the declaration of 49 or more Senators that in their judgment the people of the country are not competent to select their President. I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine. I shall vote against the resolution and await with interest the vote of Senators whose party slogan a few years ago was "Let the people rule." Nor can I subscribe to the declaration in the resolution that leaving the selection of their President to the American people would be "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions." Such a reflection as the upon the American people is wholly unwarranted and unjustified.

This same thought was expressed by Senator Shortridge, of California, and he was even more satirical when he asserted:

This resolution might well be debated by members of some kindergarten school in some remote village, but the Senate of the United States is not the place for its consideration. However, the Senator from Wisconsin, seeing the pillars of the Republic trembling and the "wide arch of the ranged empire" collapsing, and fearing that Plymouth Rock may be taken up and thrown into the sea, introduces this moth-eaten resolution.

I wonder what would have been said in the Roman Senate when Hannibal was within a few miles from Rome, out there on the Appian Way, if some senator in his toga had risen and introduced a resolution that no general of the Roman Army should be appointed or reelected a third time—if it had been suggested that Fabius be dismissed. As Senators familiar with history know, if a Roman senator had made such a proposition in the Roman Senate he would have been hurled from the Tarpeian Rock; he would have been regarded as another Catiline.

But Mr. Coolidge, who had made his famous "I do not choose to run" statement 6 months before, was as firm in his determination as was Washington. Had he consented. I believe that this country would have been better off today. But we had Mr. Hoover and the collapse of our financial structures, miserable human derelicts roaming the country in search of food and work, soldiers who risked life in the World War burned out of pitiful shelters here in the Capital, and a condition bordering on revolution.

In the history of the Congress there have been many impractical emanations from parliamentary thought, but none yet has been so illogical as to disqualify a man from the Presidency because he has served two terms as President. So that Congress, in its career, at all its sessions, has subscribed to my thesis that the third-term tradition has neither authenticity nor political value, for this myth, without reason or responsibility, has never been translated into law.

For more than a century tradition forbade many things we have today. The election of Senators by the people violated tradition; so did the collection of Federal income taxes; women's suffrage was another. We have changed the dates for sessions of Congress and the inauguration of the President and Vice President. We have changed the gold content of our dollar, and the Supreme Court has followed public sentiment in its decisions since these troubled times visited us.

We are a nation of realists. We are not mythomaniacs. Nor are we even traditionalists, unless it is that we adopt tradition when it meets the purposes of the day.

Surely the present generation has not allowed freedom to bog down under the weight of inapplicable tradition.

Long years of mental and physical strife have formulated our political freedom, but a depression came and left us free to starve. Violence had to be done to alleged vested rights so that we would have a nation of free live men instead of free dead men. The freedom won at Valley Forge was to be carried on to life and not to death; to homes and not to slums; to all and not a few. So a President, pledged to serve the country by permeating our economics with the freedom inherited by all, was inaugurated.

President Roosevelt recognized that if we depended on traditional economics that our ancestors would have died in vain, for America would have perished just when the World War had established our leadership in the world. He preached a new philosophy of Government obligation-that while it impinged on personal prerogatives, which had developed to the point of danger to the Republic, in the long run not only saved the economically weak but the too economically strong from destruction.

Roosevelt was a practical visionary in this, but at the same time could look back and get comfort from the founding fathers and their successor patriots, who wanted men not only free politically but free from want. He proclaimed an economic emancipation. This was not at first welcome to those apparently damaged by the readjustment, but now they are seeing its wisdom even from a subjective point of view.

Roosevelt philosophy banished the poorhouses that they had thought traditional. It vitiated the fear of want in old age and hard times, yet casual philosophers had subscribed to the accepted inevitability of "the poor we have always with The major concern now presented is whether the country shall or shall not chart its economic course in the direction set by the New Deal. That decision rests with the people and their relations with President Roosevelt. He has not indicated any desire to retire; he has not declared his work done; he has not grown dispirited under the cares of office. And I do not know whether or not he would accept a renomination. The convention should, however, ignore the third-term taboo, for even though it has historical basis it would be of paramount consequence that we know whether the country wants a continuance of the New Deal as developed by President Roosevelt.

Rather than to subscribe to an historical myth it is far more important to the permanent welfare of our country that the best available candidate be chosen. That should and will be done.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6635) to amend the Social Security Act, and for other

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6635, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, H. R. 6635, now before the Committee for discussion and consideration, is the result of the work of the Committee on Ways and Means, which began the 1st of February last. That committee conducted hearings for about 50 days, during which approximately 2,500 pages of testimony were taken. The committee was then in executive session for something like 6 weeks, giving diligent and painstaking thought and consideration to the very important matter it had under consideration.

The report on the bill contains about 120 pages and is a full and detailed explanation of the bill. Much of the bill, I may say, is technical and somewhat complicated and difficult to understand. I, therefore, would suggest to Members who are anxious to know what the bill contains that they read very carefully the report of the committee, which gives a fuller and more complete explanation of the bill than either I or any member of the committee, for lack of time, would be able to give during the debate. I am sure that if any Member who may be uncertain as to what is contained in the bill will give careful study to the report he will be able to get information on the subject.

The bill has the unanimous support, I believe, of the Committee on Ways and Means. It is true that the minority filed supplemental views, but as far as I know they have no criticism of or have made no objection to what is contained in the majority report. The majority and minority members of the committee sat together in studying this bill. This is the first bill of this magnitude and importance, and of such controversial a nature, to be free from any evidence whatever, the least trace, of partisanship, as far as our deliberations were concerned during the consideration and preparation of the bill in executive session. However, I regret that their fine record is spoiled by what is contained in the supplemental report, which is rather full of political implications and suggestions. I may say with all due respect that while I appreciate the fine cooperation and assistance given by the minority members of the committee, who are entitled to credit along with the other members for the work of our committee, yet I have noticed that our Republican friends have a patent on two things. One is criticism and the other is boasting. As far as I am concerned, I have no desire or disposition to infringe on that patent. They are welcome to it. They say something about what they told us when the bill was up before, and about their record, but they do not call attention to the fact that during the long years of the incumbency of the minority party, when social-security legislation was needed just as badly as it was in 1935, not a step was taken, not a thing was done, not a move was made as far as a Nation-wide effort on the part of the Federal Government to deal with this question was concerned.

If they are so infallible and so perfect of judgment, if their conversion is genuine and sincere, if it is a real regeneration and not just a reformation, if it is an act of the heart and not of the head, why on earth did they not do something about it when they were in power. This is, indeed, a strange thing to me, and it does seem that with their splendid record on this bill they should not have spoiled it in their supplemental

The first definite step toward enacting into law a comprehensive national social security program was begun by the transmission of a Presidential message to the Congress on June 8, 1934. In that message President Roosevelt said:

Our task of reconstruction does not require the creation of new and strange values. It is rather the finding of the way once more to known, but to some degree forgotten, ideals and values. If the means and details are in some instances new, the objectives are as permanent as human nature.

Among our objectives I place the security of the men, women, and children of the Nation first.

And later, in transmitting the report of the Committee on Economic Security and in urging its adoption by the Congress, the President said.

The establishment of sound means toward a greater future economic security of the American people is dictated by a prudent consideration of the hazards involved in our national life. No one can guarantee this country against the dangers of future depressions, but we can reduce those dangers. We can eliminate many of the factors that cause economic depressions, and we can provide the means of mitigating their results. This plan for economic se-curity is at once a measure of prevention and a method of allevia-

We pay now for the dreadful consequences of economic insecurity—and dearly. This plan presents a more equitable and infinitely less expensive means of meeting these costs. We cannot to neglect the plain duty before us. I strongly recommend action to attain the objectives sought in this report.

With the benefit of the report of the Committee on Economic Security and the splendid cooperation of the advisory committees, the Congress, in August of 1935, enacted into law our existing social-security program. Until that time, no effort had been made on a comprehensive national scale to provide relief for distress, destitution, and unemployment among all of our citizens, and want among our aged until these hazards were actually upon us in full measure. Theretofore we had waited until the grip of depression or other national crisis had so weakened our resources that to then make a reasonable provision for these hazards, that were created or greatly intensified by such a crisis, was either impossible or likely to seriously disrupt our economic structure.

By the social-security plan we are doing on a national scale what the prudent individual attempts to do for himself: that is, to utilize and equalize the fruits of labor by laying up a portion thereof for relief during unemployment and destitution in old age. The adoption of this plan was an enormous step and not one to be taken hurriedly and without the advice of experts and the well-considered forethought of persons trained and qualified in the fields of economics and social science. We did the best we could with all of the resources at hand, but no one considered the program perfect, no more than the first steam engine, the first automobile, the first airplane, or the first radio was thought to be perfect.

The important thing-the point upon which we all have reason to be proud—is that the first step, the difficult step, was taken and the plan is now in full operation. Our faith has been eminently justified by works rather than words, and our hopes have ripened into realities. Let us look at some of the concrete accomplishments of this program. More than 27,500,000 workers are protected by unemployment insurance laws in all of the States; some 44,000,000 workers have oldage insurance accounts and are laying up amounts, which are matched by their employers, to provide for a decent and respectable old age free from want; more than 2,500,000 of those now in need—the aged, the blind, and children in broken homes—are receiving aid from combined Federal-State funds; and public-health and child-welfare measures have been provided and strengthened throughout the length and breadth of our land.

Before Congress undertook national consideration of this problem only one State had succeeded in passing an unemployment compensation law. Today, in line with the terms of our national act, all of the States in the Union, together with the District of Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaii, have such laws.

During the past 4 years more real progress has been made in bridging the gaps of unemployment among our workers than in all of our past history. Although the benefits are just beginning to be effective, approximately $600,000,000 has already been paid to temporarily unemployed persons. This money has not only provided the workers and their families with daily necessities, but in doing so it has accomplished a double purpose by helping to turn the wheels of local and national industry by helping to maintain consuming power at something like a normal level.

The majority of our workers need no longer fear the dire distress and want for bare necessities that formerly accompanied unemployment, particularly in our industrial centers. While the benefits are less than full pay, and thereby put no premium on idleness, they do spread earnings and conserve savings and, above all, provide for the necessities of a decent existence. In addition, unemployment insurance operates in conjunction with public employment services in every State, and one of its major objectives is to find jobs for workers temporarily unemployed.

While losing a job is a serious matter, and is an event that may occur several times, it generally has a temporary aspect. The impending hazard of destitution in old age, which hangs like the sword of Damocles over the heads of a large percentage of our people in our highly industrialized society, is far more final. It is an easy enough thing to say that everyone should lay aside enough to sustain him in old age, but experience has proved that even the best intentions of thrift are defeated by the vicissitudes and circumstances that attend our daily lives. We know that whatever intentions or efforts there may be regarding modest comfort during the final years, few achieve this goal. Of our citizens over 65, 2 out of 3 are dependent upon others for support.

To many of the youth or middle-aged this two-to-one gamble carries no effective threat. Our old-age insurance system, however, enables them to build up a retirement income as a right based on their own work and wages. We are thus fostering savings and furnishing a strong incentive to thrift in providing for our citizens a systematic program under which they may lay by a sufficiency during their earning years to provide for their wants when they are no longer able to earn. A large percentage of those gainfully employed in our country already have accounts under this plan, and upon retirement at the age of 65 or later the vast majority of these will be entitled to monthly benefits which will continue for the rest of their lives.

In addition, the Federal Government is providing about one-half of the cost of public assistance to almost 2,000,000 old people who lack means of support. These are the persons who are already old and during whose youth there was no social-security program providing for insurance against want in their old age. Theirs is an immediate need and is being met.

Under this plan more than $620,000,000 has been made available by Federal grants and aids to the States for the maintenance of the program of public assistance. Of this amount, $553,000,000 was for old-age assistance; over $16,000,000 was for aid to the blind; and $72,000,000 was for aid to dependent children. These figures coupled with the $600,000,000 which has been paid in unemployment insurance, make a total of more than $1,200,000,000 in benefits that have been paid under this program by the Federal Government alone. With respect to the grants for public assistance, these amounts have on the whole been matched by State funds. Amounts paid under the old-age insurance are so far relatively small, as monthly payments have not yet become effective.

These are, in brief outline, some of the concrete achievements of our social-security program. I know, however, of no reliable yardstick with which to measure what is undoubtedly the greatest benefit of all. I refer to the peace of mind, the contentment, and satisfaction which is created in the minds of our citizens by the realization of the security which this program makes possible. I refer also to the intangible but nevertheless valuable asset in the attitude of citizens toward their Government. The American people believe that government can and should, insofar as its resources will permit, provide for the security and well-being of all the people by the establishment of a program under which they can contribute to their own welfare and at the same time to the welfare of their fellow citizens.

Although we know that this program is not perfect and, because of administrative difficulties, is not as inclusive as it might possibly be, the plan does contain the broadest program for social security ever undertaken by any government.

The present bill aims to strengthen and extend the principles and objectives of the Social Security Act. The foundations of a permanent program have been laid and your committee deems it wise to build upon the present structure.

Old-age insurance, unemployment compensation, and public assistance are now accepted as permanent in our fabric of social reforms.

The present bill is designed to widen the scope and to improve the administration of these programs without altering their essential features.

I shall but briefly summarize some of the principal features of the bill.

First, I desire to call attention to the matter of taxes.

The old-age insurance tax has been frozen at 1 percent on both employee and on employer for the years 1940, 1941, and 1942, instead of $1\frac{1}{2}$ percent applicable for said years under existing law. This change will save employers and workers about \$275,000,000 in 1940, or a total of approximately \$825,000,000 for the 3-year period.

Another change of material benefit to business is that of limiting the unemployment insurance tax to the first $3,000 of salaries paid, rather than the entire amount of salaries paid. This change will save employers approximately $65,000,000 annually. A further $15,000,000 saving is made for refunds and abatements to employers who paid their 1936, 1937, and 1938 unemployment compensation contributions too late to the States to receive the 90-percent credit allowed under the existing law.

Other savings to business are carried in the pending bill by a provision under which States may reduce the rate of their unemployment compensation tax when their reserve fund has become one and one-half times the highest contributions, or benefit payments, during any 1 year out of the preceeding 10. Under this provision, it is estimated that all except about five States will be able to meet the requirement and the minimum standards provided, during 1940, and if they should reduce their rates from 2.7 to 2 percent an additional savings of from two hundred to two hundred and fifty million dollars will be brought about.

Thus the savings above mentioned through 1940 may aggregate some $580,000,000. In addition such savings for the ensuing 2 years may amount to approximately $1,130,000,000, or a total savings of $1,710,000,000.

I shall now briefly touch upon the benefit side of the picture.

OLD-AGE INSURANCE BENEFITS

Old-age insurance benefits have been liberalized, benefits provided for aged wives, and for widows and children. The number of aged persons in our population is steadily growing. The extent of this growth is best illustrated by comparing the estimated 8,200,000 persons over 65 years of age at the present time to the number in 1900 when there were only 3,080,000 and with the 6,634,000 in 1930.

As a result of our study of the problem of old-age insurance we are agreed that the present system should be revised in order to bring the structure of benefits more closely to the basic needs of our people now and in the future.

However, we cannot too strongly emphasize that with the limited funds available for this type of insurance protection, thrift and individual effort must continue to be the chief reliance for future security.

Under existing law old-age insurance benefits do not begin until 1942, and for a considerable number of years thereafter the benefit payments would remain small, and in many cases would have to be supplemented by outright grant of old-age assistance.

Our committee believes it is essential that the contributory basis of old-age insurance should be strengthened, not weakened, and therefore has provided that benefit payments begin as of January 1, 1940, instead of 1942. This change coupled with larger monthly payments in the earlier years will lessen what misapprehension some might have as to the financial operation of the plan.

The basic problem confronting the committee was how to provide more adequate and effective benefits, particularly in the early years of operation, without unduly increasing the future costs.

We, therefore, have provided for carrying into effect the suggestion and recommendation of the Social Security Advisory Council, which was created by the Senate and whose personnel, was to a large degree, selected by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg] in cooperation with the other members of the Senate subcommittee and the Social Security Board.

Their recommendation, which our committee followed was, first, to substitute additional monthly benefits to wives and children, widows, and orphans in lieu of the present 31/2 percent lump sum payable to the estates of deceased workers. We, however, enlarged upon their recommendation by providing for dependent parents, and certain payments in lieu of burial expenses.

We likewise agreed to their suggestion and recommendation to increase the amount of benefit payments in the earlier years to both single and married persons, but the benefits of single persons with high earning retiring years hence are reduced somewhat. However, this does not mean that unmarried persons who contribute for many years will receive less protection than they could purchase from a private insurance company. They still receive more protection than they could purchase with the same amount of contributions.

Tables 1 and 2, on pages 8 and 10 of the committee report, give a comparison of benefit payments under existing law and under the provisions of the pending bill, which I ask permission to insert in my remarks at this point.

It is assumed, with respect to the revised plan, that an individual earns at least $200 in each year of coverage in order to be eligible to receive the 1-percent increment.
 If this were not the case, the benefit would be somewhat lower.

Benefits not paid until after 5 years of coverage.

The present law provides for only two general types of benefits, namely (1) monthly old-age benefits to qualified individuals, and (2) lump-sum payments to nonqualified individuals and upon death.

The present law is therefore limited in scope in that it does not provide current monthly benefits to the surviving wife of an aged annuitant nor to the surviving widow with dependent children. This bill provides for paying survivor benefits, and I direct your attention to table 3 of the report on page 12, which I shall insert at this point.

 $^{\rm i}$ It is assumed that an individual earns at least \$200 in each year of coverage. If this were not the case, the benefit would be somewhat lower.

The net effect of these changes in benefit payments is that the annual cost in the early years will be greater, the annual cost in the later years less, although the average annual cost over the next 40 years will be about the same as under the present law.

The pending bill extends old-age insurance coverage to approximately 1,100,000 additional workers by removing the exemption of maritime employees, wages earned after 65, and covering employees of certain Federal instrumentalities such as national banks and State banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System.

On the other hand, in order to eliminate the nuisance of inconsequential tax payments, the bill excludes certain services performed for fraternal benefit societies and other non-profit institutions, such as college students working their way through college by working for fraternities, and persons receiving nominal sums of not over $45 per quarter.

Additional coverage amendments are proposed in the pending bill dealing with agricultural labor, State employment, family employment, employees of foreign governments, and others.

The present act excludes agricultural labor, domestics, and casual labor. None of this class are brought under the terms of the act, as the committee was unanimous that it would be practically an administrative impossibility. I repeat, the pending bill continues the exemption of agricultural labor but defines the term so as to clarify its meaning and to extend the same to certain services not now exempt under the present definition of agricultural labor.

The pending bill contains certain amendments which affect the financial framework of the old-age insurance system, especially with reference to the old-age reserve account, concerning which you and the country have heard much in the past several months. Much misinformation as to the handling and investment of the funds of this account has been given, and the amendments proposed in the pending bill are made in spite of and not because of such misinformation. If anyone still entertains any doubt as to the stability and safety of these funds, or the manner in which they have been invested, I suggest they read the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] in the Congressional Record of April 6, beginning on page 3933, and especially note the quotations contained therein from Secretary Mellon's annual reports of 1925 and 1926 relative to his handling and investment of the funds in the adjusted-service certificate fund account in the same manner as Secretary Morgenthau has handled and invested the old-age reserve account.

The bill changes the old-age reserve account to a trust fund, with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board, all ex officio, acting as a board of trustees. Instead of requiring that such funds shall be invested so as to yield 3 percent, as provided under the present law, the pending bill provides that they shall be invested so as to earn interest at the current average rate of interest as is done in the case of the unemployment trust fund, which at the present time is 2½ percent. Instead of the mythical $47,000,000,000 reserve of which we have heard so much, it will probably never exceed eight to ten billion dollars, and will conform to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury of not more than three times the highest prospective annual benefits in the ensuing 5 years.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The recommendations of the committee relative to unemployment compensation deal with certain changes which in no way alter the fundamental Federal-State pattern now set in the Federal law. I have previously briefly referred to the change made in the tax provisions with respect to taxing only the first $3,000 of salary, and the reduction of tax rate dependent upon reserves and benefit payments meeting certain minimum standards.

Other provisions of the pending bill clarify existing law as to coverage and administration. It is not surprising that there has been some criticism voiced in the past about the administration of the unemployment compensation laws by the States, when it is considered that at the time of the enactment of the Social Security Act in 1935 there was but one State which had an unemployment compensation law. Today all 48 States and Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia have such laws. More than 27,500,000 workers are covered by these laws and about 3,800,000 temporarily unemployed workers have received benefits amounting to nearly $400,000,000 during the year 1938, and about $145,000,000 during the first 4 months of 1939. To set up and place these systems into operation was a task that challenged the of administrators, and, while delay in passing on claims of applicants necessarily occurred, it is gratifying to note that the latest figures available for 1939 show that practically all States are now currently disposing of all claims received.

AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

The bill provides additional aid to dependent children by increasing the Federal grant to States on a 50-50 matching basis instead of only a one-third Federal grant as provided under existing law. The Federal Government likewise increases its grant for administration from one-third to one-half

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Your committee endorses the splendid work which has been carried on by the States in rehabilitating men and women so they could provide the comforts and necessities of life for themselves rather than be the objects of charity. In view of what has been accomplished with the funds available, your committee has recommended an additional Federal grant of $1,000,000 annually, which I am confident will pay in social dividends many times over that sum.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. Did the committee give consideration to a new section of the bill covering totally incapacitated persons? Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I suppose the gentleman from Arkansas has reference to totally and permanently disabled cases.

Mr. TERRY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. I am sure the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton], the chairman of the committee, will recall that the Social Security Board brought this matter to the attention of the committee but did not recommend immediate action; therefore, the committee thought further study was necessary, in view of the cost and administrative problems involved.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I have related some of the accomplishments of the present social-security law and indicated some of the changes made by the present bill. I am confident that our committee has done the very best work that it possibly could under most difficult and trying conditions. As I have before stated, of course, what we have done up to date is not perfect, but the foundation is well laid. It is a well-thought-out and wrought-out plan, and by continuous study and amending the law as experience demonstrates its imperfections I am sure that we will build a superstructure for social security that will not only be a relief and of benefit to those for whom it is intended but it will be the pride of the Nation, a lamp to the feet and a light to the path of other nations so far as social-security legislation is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hoffman].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MILLS of Arkansas). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, we all know that the Workers Alliance has a delegation here. They want us to appropriate $2,250,000,000 to provide jobs. Undoubtedly there is merit in the proposition that a man ought to be permitted to work. At the same time that those delegations are here we have in Washington at least three projects, the art project, the Jefferson Memorial, and the big bridge across the river over on Pennsylvania Avenue SE. We have more than 100 private building projects, all of which, if permitted to be carried on, would employ hundreds of men; and we have men on strike, picketing and preventing men working unless the contractors are willing to pay 80 cents per hour for unskilled labor, 90 cents for semiskilled labor, and $13 a day for a 7-hour day for skilled labor. Something is radically wrong when all over the country men and women who want to work for 50 cents an hour or less cannot find jobs and here in Washington men are not permitted to work at 70 cents an hour for unskilled labor.

It is more than passing strange that this Congress should be asked to appropriate this $2,250,000,000 to provide jobs when right here in Washington there are jobs and men cannot work at them. There is something wrong somewhere. There is something decidedly wrong when in the State of Michigan during the past week some 70,000 men were prevented from working at jobs where wages and hours of work and working conditions were entirely satisfactory, and the only fly in the ointment was that those men did not join an affiliate of the C. I. O.

What is the sense of appropriating money to put men to work when there is in this country some organization that can say to 70,000 men in one city, "You shall not work until you have joined a particular organization." What is the sense to it?

The Committee on Labor of this House is now conducting hearings on the Wagner law, which is being used by the C. I. O., with the assistance of the National Labor Relations Board, to keep men who want to work out of their jobs. There is no question about it. I think it was in yesterday's paper I noticed an article that in the clothing industry there will soon be a combination between employer and employee to the effect that no garments are to go on the market to be sold by retail merchants unless they bear a certain label.

Within the past 2 weeks we had a demonstration—and it was a demonstration; we cannot get away from that fact—where all of the miners in the soft-coal industry, or at least a vast majority of them, were forced, whether they wanted or not, to join the United Mine Workers in order to get a job. We have the fact that down at Harlan, Ky., the Federal Government is feeding the men who are on strike and who will not work because the men who want to give them jobs—because the operators who are willing to pay them to work—will not sign a contract which provides that every man who works must belong to a particular organization.

I have not been able to get a copy of the decision that the Supreme Court rendered yesterday in which it was held that the freedom of speech was denied to those who wanted to hold certain meetings in Jersey City in New Jersey. I assume that that decision is correct under the Constitution; and if it is correct, and if it be true that the C. I. O. has—as the Court held in the case where the Communists wanted to distribute their literature in Oregon—the right to use the streets and parks to distribute its literature, then the question which I have in mind is this: Are the employers, those who have the jobs, those who have the money to pay men who are willing to work and who want to work and who need work, are those employers to be permitted to tell prospective employees, at least, that they need not join that particular organization in order to hold a job?

Putting it a little differently: Does this rule work both ways; or is it true that only members of a certain organization can have the benefit of free speech and a free press?

The papers tell us that our Attorney General, the one-time Governor of Michigan, who suspended for a period of more than 30 days the operation of the laws in Michigan and who defied court orders, who was a law unto himself, is now going about the country and sending men down to Harlan, Ky., to see that men should have their civil liberties protected. But nowhere in any paper that I have been able to find has there been any declaration on the part of the Attorney General, or anyone else connected with this administration, that the employer may say anything about the advisability of his employees joining or not joining any organization; and nowhere has the Attorney General of the United States, the man who is in charge of the enforcement of the law, or any other administrative officer charged with the enforcement of the law, said that a man who wants to work shall have the right to work.

And the Wagner law and the decisions of the Labor Board make it an unfair labor practice for an employer to advance any argument whatsoever to his employees suggesting that their interests can be best served by not joining a labor organization or by joining a particular labor organization.

Where is the right of free speech and a free press guaranteed to the employer? Nowhere but in the Constitution, and it is denied to him by the National Labor Relations Act and the practice of the Labor Board.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to do so, but the rule provides that the debate must be confined to the bill. The gentleman is speaking out of order.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But I obtained permission to speak out of order.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It is all right. In any event, I am talking in a way on the bill, because the bill, as I understand it, is devised to bring aid to a certain group of our citizens. And I am speaking about another group which is deprived of its constitutional rights by a law which we passed and by a board which is spending funds appropriated by us.

The matter that I have been speaking about is where this Congress has appropriated money to aid those who lack jobs, those who are in need, and the thought that comes to some of us is whether or not if we appropriate this moneyand I am not speaking against the bill or the amendment to the bill—but whether, if we do appropriate this money, it is going to fall into the hands of those who use it to advance their own purposes. For example, if I am correctly advised, and I think I am, down here this morning at the hearing before the committee investigating W. P. A. a man named Charles H. White, who was a member of the Communist Party until 1936, who was a member of the Workers Alliance, who at the present time is a member of Federal Project Workers Local 20940, who was once a member of Workers Alliance Staff Local of the Federal arts project, testified that he was sent to Russia along with a group to get instructions over there on how and what to do here in America; that over there he was instructed in a school, that he was to organize a new republic in the South among the Negroes, that he was given instruction in sharpshooting, machine gunnery, horsemanship, building of barricades in the streets, the destruction of tanks, methods of street fighting-and this, mind you, on a trip where he was recommended for instruction by Herbert Benjamin, the head of the Workers Alliance.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Did the gentleman say he was to instruct the young Republicans when he came back?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The young what?

Mr. GREEN. The young Republicans. Was not that what the gentleman said?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know of any young Republican who would listen to any such instruction.

Mr. GREEN. I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he stated this man was to instruct the young Republicans.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I said he was to establish a new republic amongst the Negroes, create a Negro organization in the South, he was going to establish a new political state among the Negroes in the South. That was the point, and that was a part of his instructions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hoffman].

Mr. HOFFMAN. He belonged to the same outfit that pulled those sit-down strikes on us in Michigan. He belonged to that same organization—he has seen the error of his ways, he said—he belonged to the same organization which attempts to nullify the efforts which we make here. We can appropriate all the money we wish to create jobs, to create work, and then these men come along and prevent men working in your district in the mine, on the farm, in the factory, or in the mill. Throughout the country are millions of men willing to work at the average wages being paid. What do these men do? They come along and by force-and I do not mean maybe. I mean by force-prevent men who want to work from working; deprive them of their civil liberties, and the Attorney General does nothing about

The result is that when we have the jobs the men cannot work at them. How much longer are we going to stand for it? In my humble judgment what this House should do is to make the Labor Committee get busy on amendments to the Wagner law, reaffirm our rights, and see to it that once more the civil liberties are returned to the people. And I mean to the people as a whole, to every individual citizen. I do not mean civil liberty only for the members of the C. I. O., for the Communists, for the labor racketeer. But I mean the civil liberty of the worker should be returned to him; that he should be permitted to work; that the employer should be permitted to hire and to pay the man who wants to work and that the man who wants to work should not be required to join any organization. The employer should not be required to hire only those who belong to a particular organization.

Unless we do that, a part of our liberty is gone and it is only a question of time until the practice will be extended to include all and the revolution which so many have predicted will be with us. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER.]

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman to submit such a request. The rule adopted by the House provides that debate must be confined to the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I would remind the Chairman that the gentleman who occupied the chair a while ago allowed the preceding speaker to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, that cannot be done. Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, as the opening speaker for the Republican minority, let me say that in the consideration of the bill over the last several months we have endeavored to do all we could to help perfect the existing Social Security Act.

We have joined with the Democratic members of the committee, in a nonpartisan way, to make such amendments in the law as would make it more liberal and more sound.

Admittedly the job that has been done is not perfect.

There are a number of features of the bill with which I for one do not agree, and, of course, it is doubtful if any man or group of men could write a bill which would be satisfactory to everyone.

The position of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee with respect to this bill is set forth in our report which accompanies that of the full committee.

In the opening paragraph of the statement of our views we sav:

This statement is submitted not in opposition to the pending bill but supplemental to the committee report.

While the bill in no sense represents a complete or satisfactory solution of the problem of social security, it at least makes certain improvements in the present law—some of which we have ourselves heretofore suggestedwhich we believe justify us in supporting it despite its defects.

THE $47,000,000,000 RESERVE

We of the Republican minority are particularly proud of the part we have played in bringing about the abolition of the proposed mythical reserve fund of $47,000,000,000 and the substitution of a modified pay-as-you-go policy with respect to old-age insurance.

We have criticized from the very beginning this reserve fund hoax, under which wage earners and employers were being taxed an excessive amount on the theory that a $47,000,-000,000 reserve was being built up to pay retirement pensions in future years.

Of course, we all know that the money which is being raised by pay-roll taxes does not actually go into the trust fund.

Appropriations are made to the fund by Congress, it is true, but the Secretary of the Treasury takes the cash and uses it for current expenditures, and all that goes into the fund is the Government's IOU.

The Republican Party made an issue of this procedure in the 1936 campaign, but the people did not seem to be able to understand the devious ways of high finance.

We kept hammering away, nevertheless.

In January 1937 a minority group which had been appointed to study the question of old-age insurance in behalf of the Republicans in both branches, made a report in which it recommended the abolition of the $47,000,000,000 reserve fund and the substitution of a pay-as-you-go policy with a small contingent reserve.

At the same time a reduction of the proposed schedule of pay-roll taxes was suggested, which, of course, was a natural corollary of the pay-as-you-go policy.

Those serving on this committee of Republicans were Congressmen REED of New York, and JENKINS of Ohio, and Senators Vandenberg, of Michigan, and Townsend, of Delaware.

Senator Vandenberg was able to secure a hearing on the Republican proposal by the Senate Finance Committee, and as a result of that hearing an agreement was reached between the Finance Committee and the Social Security Board for the appointment of an advisory committee on social security, to be composed of outstanding businessmen, labor leaders, and experts in the field of social security.

That committee made its report in December of last year, and one of its principal recommendations was the abolition of the colossal $47,000,000,000 reserve fund and the substitution of a pay-as-you-go policy.

All during the hearings our friends on the Democratic side did their best to defend the $47,000,000,000 reserve.

They, of course, did not want to admit that a mistake had been made or that the public was being fooled as to what was actually in the fund.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that I was one of the Democratic Members who took exception to the remarks made by some of the Republican Members, not the gentleman speaking, with reference to calling the security-reserve fund "I O U's of the Government." They are the same type of securities that are held by all the other trust funds the Government administers. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me in that. I think none of the Democratic Members ever admitted what the gentleman from Massachusetts called a mythical $47,000,000,000 reserve, because we know there was no such reserve and never would be

Mr. TREADWAY. I may add to the gentleman's remarks that the reason that there was such a reserve started was the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury wanted to take the cash for governmental expenditures. The money did not go into the trust fund at all, and that is what we objected to. You stated you were laying a foundation for a $47,000,000,000 trust fund, but there was no indication of its being put into effect although the law so provided. I am not saying that the money was used in an unlawful manner, but nevertheless it is a fact that unless the law is changed at this time there will be supposedly a paper accumulation of $47,000,000,000 in the course of years which will not actually exist; therefore the taxpayers of the country will be called upon to pay additional taxes when the obligations become due in the future. That is all I care to say about that at this time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I cannot help but yield to my delightful friend from the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Thank you.

Will the gentleman admit that special obligation bonds were issued with reference to the retirement fund and with reference to other special funds?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, it is not limited to this fund. I am criticizing this fund right now.

Mr. McCORMACK. The late Secretary Mellon recommended the issuance of 4-percent special obligations for the retirement fund, and properly so.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is the gentleman asking a question?
Mr. McCORMACK. They will get a certain rate of interest. The Government bonds cannot be purchased in the open market bearing that rate of interest. The only way you can guarantee it is by the issuance of special obligations. What we did in this case was to follow the recommendations of a very able former Secretary of the Treasury, whom I respected and whose memory I admire. [Applause.] He was a great American and I admire him and respect his memory. I refer to the late Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Massachusetts is undoubtedly speaking accurately in general terms, but this social-security fund, to which I am referring and which I am now criticizing, was not in existence during the time that Mr. Mellon held the office of Secretary of the Treasury. The social-security fund never was thought of at that time. Therefore, I maintain that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] should not connect Mr. Mellon's memory up with anything that had to do with a fund which he never heard of in his life. He may know about it now, but he did not know about it during his lifetime. It may be that Mr. Mellon knows what is transpiring here today. If he does, he certainly will repudiate the fact there was any connection between anything he did as Secretary of the Treasury and the social-security fund of the year 1939.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sure there is no Member on the floor of the House now who for a moment interpreted anything I said as connecting Mr. Mellon with this particular fund.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, I did.

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] is the only one who would place any such interpretation on what I said. What I did say was that the precedent for the issuance of special obligations was recommended to the Congress in the case of the retirement fund for Federal employees by the late Secretary of the Treasury Mellon.

Mr. CARLSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas. Mr. CARLSON. I would like to make the comment that defense has been made of these special obligations. It is interesting to note that the Ways and Means Committee is recommending to the Congress that the Board of Trustees purchase regular outstanding obligations of our Government at the current rate of interest. If the Treasury finds that it is not in the public interest to purchase regular bonds, special obligations may be issued.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. Several men have occupied the position of office of Secretary of the Treasury since the gentleman to whom the gentleman from Massachusetts referred. I want to get down to what the present Secretary of the Treasury, the Honorable Henry Morgenthau, Jr., has done in this connection. I may say very definitely to my friend from Massachusetts that certainly the present Secretary of the Treasury knew about this fund to which we are referring at the present time. Here is the story:

When it came time for the Secretary of the Treasury to appear before the committee to explain the Treasury's position on the financing of the retirement provisions, he left his Democratic supporters on the committee high and dry by coming out flat-footedly for the abolition of the $47,000.-000,000 reserve and the substitution of a pay-as-you-go policy with a reserve of not to exceed three times annual benefits being paid out.

That is the recommendation of Mr. Morgenthau. It is "right up the alley," if you wish to so refer to it, with the attitude that the Republican minority on the committee have taken from the very first in connection with their criticism of the $47,000,000,000 fund.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. As a matter of information to one who does not know very much about it, what is the proportion of the reserve fund under existing law compared with the amount of payments that have actually been made?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not sure and I stand to be corrected, because there are others who know more about the details of the measure than I do. I do not think the proportion is designated under the present law. There is a rate set and the accumulation is figured to reach in about 30 or 40 years the enormous sum of $47,000,000,000.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. I may say there has been collected up to date under the old-age annuity system over a billion dollars. There have been paid certain death claims running to a total of something like $25,000,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. There was no direct proportion, however. The reserve under the present law just grows and Mr. REED of New York. No.

Mr. TREADWAY. I was correct in making that statement. Mr. MAY. According to that statement, then, the present set-up would be about 14 to 1. I understood the gentleman to say the Treasury now recommends 3 to 1.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. Three to one is the proposed recommendation.

In Mr. Morgenthau's statement before the committee he completely reversed his testimony of 4 years ago when he insisted that the full reserve be built up. He explained his changed attitude by saying, at page 2112 of the hearings,

The argument for a large reserve does not have the validity which 4 years ago it seemed to possess.

That was a very frank and fair comment of the Secretary of the Treasury and one for which we are glad to commend him, in that he recognized that the attitude of the Department 4 years ago should not be carried out under existing conditions.

By his testimony before the committee, he admitted the soundness of the major Republican criticism of the law. Therefore, I repeat, that we of the minority are proud of the part we have played in bringing about this wholesome change in policy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

TAX SAVINGS AS A RESULT OF ADOPTION OF PAY-AS-YOU-GO PRINCIPLE Now, just a word about the so-called tax savings which will result from this change.

The Democratic majority are endeavoring to make capital out of the so-called saving by reason of not increasing taxes. How business can save anything it has not already paid is a question.

It would be better to say that the proposed change makes possible the avoidance of an immediate increase in the pay-

The New Deal might, by the same process, take credit for the billions of dollars it is saving business by not increasing taxes to the extent necessary to balance the Budget.

I do not mean to belittle the importance of the freezing of the pay-roll taxes at the present rate for 3 more years.

On the contrary, I strongly favor it; but it is just a correction of a Democratic mistake.

The present pay-roll taxes are excessive.

Under a strict pay-as-you-go policy they would not even need to be 1 percent as they are at present.

There is absolutely no justification for collecting from business concern and from the wage earners of the country more pay-roll taxes than are necessary to support the system on a sound basis.

These pay-roll taxes directly reduce the consuming power of the workers of the country and they increase the cost of goods and services because they are a burden on production and distribution.

I am in hopes that some day some substitute form of taxation can be worked out, because in many respects the payroll tax is one of the worst forms of taxation yet devised.

It amounts to a gross income tax on the wages of the lowest-paid workers.

It puts a direct penalty on the giving of employment and not only discourages the creation of new jobs but encourages the abolition of existing jobs to avoid the taxes imposed.

Business concerns must pay their share of the tax whether they make a cent of profit or not.

A concern might conceivably lose a million dollars and still have to pay a million dollar pay-roll tax.

To the small merchant the pay-roll tax may be the difference between profit and loss at the end of the year.

In any program of business appeasement the reduction or abolition of the pay-roll tax ought to stand at the head of Business concerns may complain about the corporation income tax, but they only have to pay that tax if they have

The pay-roll tax may be a tax on a loss.

The individual only has to pay an income tax if he earns over $1,000 if single and $2,500 if married, and there are other deductions besides, but the pay-roll tax is imposed on every cent the worker earns up to $3,000 a year.

The person who finds an acceptable substitute for the payroll tax should have a monument erected to his memory.

UNEMPLOYMENT TAX

The proposed plan of enabling the States to reduce their unemployment insurance pay-roll tax in cases where adequate reserves have been built up should also be heartening to business. The credit for the nucleus of this plan must go to Governor Saltonstall, of Massachusetts, and the unemployment compensation authorities of that State, including Mr. Arthur Rotch, chairman of the State advisory council. It was first suggested in a letter to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] from Governor Saltonstall dated April 7. This letter was turned over to me for a suggestion as to how best to lay the plan before Congress, and the suggestion I made was followed. I did not personally offer the plan in committee because I did not want to jeopardize its adoption by having it come from the Republican side.

Under the plan originally proposed, there was no suggestion of benefit standards which would have to be met as a condition precedent to reducing the State tax. These benefit standards were insisted upon by the Social Security Board, and in their present form they are opposed by many of the State unemployment authorities. Some fear that they may deny relief to States which can otherwise qualify by reason of having the required reserves.

There can be no question but what some form of tax relief is necessary, since many States have been continuing to build up their reserves even after making heavy payments of benefits during the present depressed state of business. As business improves, tax receipts will be even greater and the need for unemployment compensation will decline, thus further adding to the present large reserves, which now exceed over a billion dollars. A flat reduction of the tax is opposed by the Social Security Board on the ground that it would be insufficient in many instances; hence the only solution is some plan such as that sponsored by Governor Saltonstall, under which the tax rate can be adjusted to meet the needs in each State. Under the plan, regardless of the rate fixed by the State, employers will continue to get the full 90-percent credit against the Federal unemployment tax of 3 percent.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Next, as to old-age pensions. When the original socialsecurity bill was before the House in 1935, I moved to amend the bill by increasing the Federal contribution for old-age pensions from $15 a month per person to $20 a month per person, thus making possible a pension of $40 per month instead of $30.

That motion was voted down by a vote of 146 ayes to 254 noes, the vote being along party lines, with the Republicans voting "aye" and the Democrats "no."

Now, 4 years later, we have the Ways and Means Committee coming in with a recommendation along that very line.

The Democratic mills grind slowly; but eventually they come around to our point of view.

They are about to do the same thing on the tax question, with respect to which a bill will shortly be presented to the House.

On the question of old-age pensions, there can be no question but what the amounts now being paid in most States are far from adequate.

Unfortunately most of the States are not yet taking full advantage of the Federal Government's offer to make a contribution up to $15 on a 50-50 matching basis.

The average pension being paid throughout the country is only a little over $19.

In my State the average happens to be a little over $28. which means that some are getting more than that amount and some less.

The effect of the amendment will not be to increase anyone's pension automatically.

It simply holds out an offer on the part of the Government to pay one-half of the pension fixed by the State up to a maximum of $40.

At the present time Massachusetts and a number of other States are paying pensions in individual cases in excess of $30 but they have to stand the entire cost insofar as the pension exceeds that amount.

Under the amendment proposed, the Federal Government will match 50-50 on amounts between $30 and $40, the same as it is now matching 50-50 on amounts up to $30.

Doubtless proposals will be made here for the Federal Government to pay two-thirds instead of one-half, or to pay some flat sum without requiring any matching by the States.

Both these proposals are in the direction of straight-out Federal pensions on which we had a rather decisive vote here the other day.

If we start paying two-thirds it will be only a matter of time until we are requested to make the contribution threefourths, and the next step after that will be paying it all.

If we do not have State responsibility the States will be putting everybody on the roll regardless of need.

If we adopt the amendment proposed by the bill, a reasonably adequate pension can be provided if the States meet the Federal Government half way.

The responsibility is theirs to see that adequate pensions are provided.

Some will say the States cannot afford to pay increased amounts and that therefore the Federal Government should assume the burden.

But can the Federal Government afford it either?

Are the States any worse off than the Federal Government when it comes to being able to afford things?

By the end of the next fiscal year we will have piled up an accumulated deficit of twenty-seven billions, and we have been running several billions in the red each year with no

So do not let us hear anything in this debate about the Federal Government being better able to pay old-age pensions than the States.

The proposal to pay a flat sum to the States regardless of any matching is aimed at transferring the cost of old-age pensions in the South to the Northern States.

We might as well face that issue frankly and meet it head

In the Washington Post this morning there appeared an editorial on the question of increased Federal grants for oldage pensions.

Reference was made to the announced intention of a certain Member of the other body to propose that the Federal contribution be increased to two-thirds in the so-called poorer States.

The Post editorial indicated that this was simply a backdoor entrance to a Federal pension system, and I agree.

I read the concluding paragraph of that editorial:

When the House begins debate on the proposed amendments to the Social Security Act today it must be alive to the very real danger of ushering in Townsendism through the back door.

AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

The committee has increased the Federal contribution for aid to dependent children from a one-third matching basis to a 50-50 matching basis, the same as now prevails with respect to old-age assistance and pensions for the blind.

There has been a widespread demand for this change, which should prove of considerable benefit to the States by permitting them to extend their services to dependent children by taking care of more cases and by paying increased benefits to those now on the rolls.

OTHER CHANGES

I shall not at this time go into other matters covered by the bill.

The liberalized provisions relating to old-age retirement have been explained in detail and will be further referred to as the debate progresses.

I shall not take the time to go into the complicated details of these provisions, nor into some of the other matters which I have not touched upon.

Instead, I shall ask permission to insert at the conclusion of my remarks the minority report on the bill, which sets forth our comment on these provisions.

CONCLUSION

In closing, I want to utter a word or two of caution.

The pending bill goes a long way further toward a system of Government paternalism than the present law.

Its objectives are strictly humanitarian, and of the highest purpose, but we must proceed slowly or else we will be thrust fully into a socialized state.

Under Government paternalism, the people surrender their liberty for what they believe is security.

Under the old-age insurance provisions of the bill the people are being forced into a system of paternalism, regardless of their individual wishes in the matter.

I am not here today arguing against social security. On the contrary, I want to say that I am for all the security we can afford.

My remarks are simply intended as a word of warning to watch our step as we proceed in the direction of what we believe to be more liberalized social security.

If we proceed too fast the whole system may collapse of its own weight, and we may find that instead of more security we have none at all.

This bill proposes the first amendments that have been made to the Social Security Act as passed in 1935.

It puts the Federal Government more and more into the position of godfather to the people.

If other amendments are made in later years, as undoubtedly they will be, we will reach the point of absolute Government paternalism.

While I intend to vote for the bill now before the House, which in many respects improves the present law, I dread to anticipate what it may lead to in future years.

We are told that despite the fact that the bill proposes to increase benefits and to pay pensions to wives, widows, dependent children, and parents of workers, it will cost no more in the long run than the present limited system.

This is because lump-sum payments are done away with in the case of workers dying before reaching the retirement age and because benefits to single persons are reduced insofar as future years are concerned.

However, this Congress cannot legislate for or control future Congresses. We know that benefits under the act will not be reduced, but further extended. We know that this will increase the cost still further. But we do not know whether future Congresses will levy the taxes necessary to maintain the system without taxing the people generally for its support. We are not even sure that the scheduled increase of pay-roll taxes in 1943 will be allowed to go into effect. At that time the rate will jump to 2 percent each on employers and employees instead of the present 1-percent rate, which the bill continues for 3 more years.

There is a question how much the workers are going to be willing to contribute out of their wages for old-age security or how much they can afford to contribute. There is also a question how much business can stand in the way of increased taxes for social security. Even at the present 1-percent rate the pay-roll taxes amount to $500,000,000 annually. At 2 percent the yield will be around a billion annually, and at 3 percent the yield will be around one and one-half billions in addition to all other taxes.

We are continually urging reemployment, but at the same time we are putting increased burdens on employers for giving employment. If we keep on adding burdens to business, the time is not far distant when the Government will have to take over all business, industry, and commerce if it is to be carried on at all. Then the Government will indeed become the Great White Father. So I repeat, let us proceed slowly in liberalizing the Social Security Act lest in pursuing security we lose it altogether, and with it the liberties of the people. [Applause.]

The minority views referred to by me are as follows:

SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS OF THE REPUBLICAN MINORITY

This statement is submitted, not in opposition to the pending bill but supplemental to the committee report.

While the bill in no sense represents a complete or satisfactory solution of the problem of social security, it at least makes certain improvements in the present law (some of which we have ourselves heretofore suggested) which we believe justify us in supporting it despite its defects.

ELIMINATION OF $47,000,000,000 RESERVE

We particularly commend the abandonment of the staggering and illusory $47,000,000,000 reserve fund for old-age insurance, which we have criticized from the very beginning as being unnecessary, misleading, and dangerous. The substitution of a pay-as-you-go system, with a moderate contingent reserve, as provided by the bill, is in line with what the Republican minority has always advocated. It is in accord with the Republican platform of 1936, and with the recommendations made in January 1937, by the minority group which was named by the Republicans of both branches of Congress to study the question of social security, composed of Senators Vannenbeer and Townsend and Congressmen Reed of Senators Vannenbeer and Townsend and Congressmen Reed of Senators Vannenbeer and the social Security Board of the Advisory Council on Social Security, which in December 1938 submitted a report suggesting many of the changes made by the pending bill, including the establishment of the pay-as-you-go policy. Those serving on the Advisory Council included outstanding businessmen, labor leaders, and experts in the field of social problems.

Republicans in both branches may deservedly be proud of the Republicans in both branches may deservedly be proud of the part they have played in calling to the attention of the country the dangers and burdens inherent in the present reserve structure, and in bringing about the changes proposed. The action taken by the committee is an acknowledgment of the soundness of the major Republican criticism of the existing law.

While an attempt is made under the bill to assure the workers of the country that the money they contribute through pay-roll taxes will be kept in a separate trust fund, the fact is that the amended provisions governing the investment of the reserve make little change in the present provisions. The Secretary of the Treasury, as managing trustee of the fund, will still be able to use the payas managing trustee of the fund, will still be able to use the payroll tax contributions for current governmental purposes simply by continuing to place in the fund special bonds—that is, Government I O U's—as is now being done. Although the Secretary is required to first attempt to buy outstanding obligations for investment of the reserve fund, this provision is negatived by the further provision that he need not do so if in his opinion the public interest requires that he issue the special bonds (I O U's). Probably at no time will the-Secretary ever deem it expedient to buy bonds in the open market, which means that the present practice of issuing I O U's to the fund and using the trust money for general governmental purposes will be continued unabated. The only redeeming feature is that with the abandonment of the $47,000. eral governmental purposes will be continued unabated. The only redeeming feature is that with the abandonment of the $47,000,000,000 reserve, and the substitution of a contingent reserve of not to exceed three times the highest annual benefit payments during the succeeding 5 years, there will not be as much money as otherwise for the Treasury to make use of for current extravagances.

ELIMINATION OF CONTEMPLATED INCREASE IN PAY-ROLL TAX UNDER TITLE VIII

As a consequence of the abandonment of the $47,000,000,000 reserve fund, a 3-year delay in the scheduled increase in the oldage insurance pay-roll tax has been made possible. Under existing law, the tax under title VIII would automatically increase next year to 1½ percent each on employers and employees, instead of 1 percent on each as at present. Under the pending bill, the 1-percent rate will be continued for 3 more years, thus eliminating the immediate threat of higher pay-roll taxes.

There is no question but what the present schedule of pay-roll taxes is excessive, and that these taxes constitute a powerful deterrent to business recovery. They put a direct penalty on employment and reduce the purchasing power of millions upon millions of employed persons. We heartily approve the reduction proposed by the bill, which will result in considerable relief to business and at the same time permit employed persons to retain for their own purposes a larger portion of their pay envelopes. The postponement of the scheduled increase in the pay-roll tax was one of the principal recommendations made in January 1937 by the Republican group to which we have previously referred. It, of course, was an essential feature of the pay-as-you-go policy advocated by was an essential feature of the pay-as-you-go policy advocated by the Republican members of both branches.

It is estimated that as a result of the postponement of the tax increase there will be a saving to employers and employees of $275,-000,000 annually, or a total of $825,000,000 over the 3-year period 1940-42. This amount will go into the channels of trade instead of into the Treasury to be squandered by the present administration.

UNEMPLOYMENT-INSURANCE TAX RELIEF

No less important to business are the tax savings made possible by the changes proposed in the unemployment-insurance title. Under the established policy of providing unemployment insurance under State laws, with a uniform rate of tax, despite varying conditions of unemployment, reserve funds have been built up in many States to needlessly large amounts. We feel that there is no justification for continuing to extract from business more unemployment taxes than are necessary to meet current outlays in each State and maintain a reasonable reserve. It is essential that some plan be put into effect which will result in adjusting revenues to benefits and prevent the piling up of even greater reserves as business conditions improve and receipts from the tax increase.

At the instance of Governor Saltonstall and the Massachusetts unemployment-compensation authorities, the committee has adopted a plan whereby those States which have ample reserves may reduce their unemployment tax below the 2.7-percent level now prevailing. This plan is explained in detail in the report of the full committee. No less important to business are the tax savings made possible

committee.

According to information given the committee, all but nine States are now in a position to meet the requirement as to reserves. However, there is fear on the part of many of the State unemployment-compensation officials that the standards set up as a condition precedent to reducing the State tax are such as to nullify the possibility of any reduction under the plan. Due to the fact that the proposal was not discussed during the public hearings, and that the specific language of the plan has only been available for examination by the State authorities since May 24, it is possible that some adjustments will have to be made if the hoped-for tax reduction is to be realized. These standards were insisted upon by the Social Security Board as a condition to its approval of the plan.

It is estimated that this provision may result in a saving to business of $250,000,000 annually in those States which now have the required reserves. State action will, of course, be required to put the plan into operation.

In addition, there will be a further saving of $65,000,000 annually because of the limitation of the tax base under title IX to the first $3,000 of each employee's annual earnings, as is now provided under title VIII.

A still further saving will result from the adoption of the Carlera empendment aliminating the socialed 90 percent penalty in

A still further saving will result from the adoption of the Carlson amendment eliminating the so-called 90-percent penalty in cases where the taxpayer failed to pay his State unemployment tax for 1936, 1937, or 1938 in time to get the benefit of the credit against the Federal tax. This will relieve business from unjust and excessive penalties amounting to perhaps $15,000,000.

We strongly favor the foregoing changes, which do not appear to jeopardize the payment of unemployment benefits or involve any reduction in the amount thereof reduction in the amount thereof.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Under existing law, pensions to needy persons over 65 are provided under the laws of the several States, the States themselves having full control in fixing the amount thereof, with the Federal Government reimbursing the States for one-half the total sum expended. It is provided, however, that in no case shall the Federal contribution exceed $15 per month per person. In other words, the Federal Government matches the State funds paid out for oldage pensions on a 50-50 basis, and makes no contribution unless there is a like contribution by the State. If a State pays an individual $15 per month, the Federal Government contributes $7.50 of the total. If it pays him $30 per month, the Federal contribution is $15. If it pays $40, the Federal Government contributes the first $15 and the State the balance.

When the original Social Security Act was under consideration in 1935 the Republican minority offered a motion to increase the Federal contribution to a maximum of $20, which, with a like contribution by the State, would have provided a pension of $40 per month. The motion was defeated, due to the opposition of the Democratic majority.

The committee, by its action in incorporating such an amendment in the pending bill, has agreed that the change we then proposed is desirable.

Our purpose in offering the original motion was that we considered a pension of $30 per month to be inadequate. Unfortunately, the States have not provided anything approaching even this amount on the average, despite the willingness of the Federal Government to contribute one-half the total. As of March 15, 1939, according to figures submitted by the Social Security Board, the average pension being paid throughout the country was only $19.51. The average payment by States ranged from a low of $6.11 in Arkansas to a high of $32.47 in California. The following table gives the figures for each State:

Of course, until the States take action to increase the amount of their old-age pension payments, no benefit to elderly persons will result from the more liberal Federal contribution which the bill provides. However, we hope that this evidence of a willingness on the part of the Federal Government to do its share in bringing about an increase in old-age pensions will give rise to action by the States along this line. The responsibility is now theirs to see that more adequate pensions are provided.

OLD-AGE RETIREMENT PROVISIONS

Under existing law, provision is made for a Federal system of old-age retirement annuities, under which employed persons (with certain exceptions) are to be paid retirement benefits upon reaching the age of 65. A pay-roll tax, to which we have previously referred, is imposed on such employed persons and their employers for the purpose of financing this retirement scheme. To qualify for retirement benefits, workers must have reached the age of 65 and have contributed to the system for at least 5 years, The first benefits are scheduled to be paid under existing law on January 1, 1942. The present schedule of benefit payments ranges from a minimum of $10 per month to a maximum of $85, based on the worker's total earnings during the years he has been covered under the system. In the case of workers dying before reaching the retirement age, their estates are now paid a lump sum equal to 3½ tirement age, their estates are now paid a lump sum equal to 3½ percent of the total wages earned while the worker was covered, this amount being deemed to be a return of his own contributions under the pay-roll tax. The present law makes no distinction as between married and single workers in the amount of benefits paid. No survivor benefits are provided for except the lump-sum payment above referred to.

Under the bill, it is proposed to revise the present old-age retirement provisions by increasing the benefits in certain directions and decreasing them in other directions, without making any net change in the total cost over the years. We call particular attention to these changes so that it may be fully understood just what is proposed.

The new benefits provided by the bill include the payment of monthly pensions to widows of deceased workers where there are dependent children or where the widow herself is over 65 years of age, and to dependent parents over 65 where there is no widow of the deceased worker and no dependent child.

The bill also proposes to make a distinction between married and single workers by providing a supplemental pension to workers whose wives are over 65.

The details of these proposed new benefits are set forth in the report of the full committee.

The details of these proposed new benefits are set forth in the report of the full committee.

Insofar as the workers themselves are concerned, the bill proposes to reduce the eligibility requirement from 5 to 3 years coverage under the system, and to commence the payment of benefits in 1940 instead of 1942. This change has been advocated by the Republican minority for several years. In fact, the report made by the minority group in January 1937, to which we have already called attention, proposed that payments begin on January 1, 1939.

The pending bill also revises the schedule of benefits for retired workers by increasing the amounts payable to all those retiring in the next few years, and reducing the amounts payable in future years to single persons and married men whose wives are under 65. Under existing law, the formula for computing benefits is as follows: One-half of 1 percent of the first $3,000 of total wages earned since the system has been in effect, plus one-twelfth of 1 percent of the halance. Since only the first $3,000 of each employee's annual wage is taxed, only the first $3,000 of the annual wage is counted in computing benefits.

Under the pending bill, it is proposed to base benefits not on the total earnings of the employee during his working span but upon the average monthly wage earned during that period. The new formula provided under the bill is as follows: Forty percent of the first $50 of the average monthly wage, plus 10 percent of the balance, the total thus obtained to be increased 1 percent for each year in which the worker earned $200 or more since he has been under the system. In other words, if the average monthly wage was $100, and the worker had been under the system for 20 years, his pension would be computed by taking 40 percent of the first $50 (or $20), plus 10 percent of the remaining $50 (or $51), making a total of $25, plus an additional 20 percent for the 20 years covered under the system ($5), or a grand total of $30. Following is a comparative table showing present and proposed benefits to retired workers:

From the foregoing table, it will be observed that the single person and the married man whose wife is under the age of 65 received less under the proposed plan than under the present system in the following instances:

(a) Such worker with an average wage of $50 monthly where he has been under the system 30 years or more.

(b) Such worker with an average wage of $100 or over per month where he has been under the system 20 years or more.

In the case of the $50 per month worker, the reduction is much smaller than in the case of the worker earning up to $250.

It has been estimated that about 40 percent of the persons now 21 years of age will not live to reach age 65 so as to qualify for monthly benefits. Under the proposed plan, these workers will contribute their pay-roll tax money into the system without building up any vested interest therein, such as they have under the existing law. At the present time, in the case of workers dying before reaching the retirement age, their estates would be entitled to lump-sum payments (representing a return of such contributions) as follows:

Lump-sum payments under existing law, which are abandoned

Lump-sum payments under existing law, which are abandoned under proposed plan

 100°	Average monthly wage
Years of coverage after 1937	$50	$100	$150	$200	$250
10	$210 420 630 840	$420 840 1, 260 1, 680	$630 1, 260 1, 890 2, 520	$840 1, 680 2, 520 3, 360	$1,050 2,100 3,150 4,200

These lump-sum payments will be abandoned under the proposed plan, and all that the estate of the worker will receive, provided he leaves no one behind entitled to monthly benefits, will be six times the monthly benefit he would be entitled to receive upon retirement. Such sum will be only a fraction, in many instances, of the amount of the present lump-sum payment. The virtual confiscation of the sums paid into the system by workers dying before reaching the age of 65 is for the purpose of paying a part of the cost of the increased benefits to others

The justification for this confiscation, in the eyes of the Social The justification for this confiscation, in the eyes of the Social Security Board, is the new concept of what the worker is purchasing under the old-age insurance system. At present he is deemed to be buying an annuity at age 65, with a guaranteed return of principal in case of his death before reaching that age. But under the proposed plan he is merely deemed to be insuring himself against the hazards of old age in case he reaches the retirement age. Whether the workers of the country will be satisfied with this new concept remains to be seen. It puts the Government in the position of changing the terms of a contract after it has been entered into.

In the absence of such confiscation of the pay-roll-tax contribution of workers dying before reaching the retirement age and in the absence of the contemplated reduction in the retirement henefits of absence of the contemplated reduction in the retirement benefits of workers retiring some years in the future, it would, of course, be necessary to increase the present pay-roll taxes substantially above the present schedule of rates in order to provide the proposed new and increased benefits to others.

In making these comments we do not wish to be understood as opposing the liberalization of the present old-age insurance provisions, which we believe to be commendable. However, we do question the fairness of providing these increased benefits at the expense of single persons and married men whose wives are under 65.

Many of those interested in the problem of social security are of the opinion that the existing system should not be extended or liberalized until it has been in effect for a longer period. Especially is there need for study into the ultimate costs involved. Care must be taken that unforeseen future liabilities of great magnitude are not being placed upon the taxpayers of the country by reason of providing benefits not contemplated by the original law. Investigation should also be made into the possibility of finding some means other than the present pay-roll tax to finance the old-age insurance system. It is in many respects one of the worst forms of taxation ever devised.

BROADENING OF EXEMPTIONS FROM PAY-ROLL TAXES

We wish to endorse the broadening of the exemptions from the pay-roll tax as provided under the bill, particularly as regards agricultural employment and nominal salaries paid to officers of lodges, fraternities, chambers of commerce, and so on. These exemptions are more fully explained in the report of the full committee.

PROPOSED INCLUSION OF RELIGIOUS, CHARITABLE, AND EDUCATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

The Social Security Board recommended the inclusion under the act of employees of religious, charitable, educational, and scientific institutions which, under existing law, are specifically exempted from coverage.

Due to the expressed desire of these institutions not to be covered under the act, we unanimously voted to continue the present exemption accorded to them. We believe that churches, charities, educational institutions, and other groups included in the present exemption should have the right to say whether or not they wish to be included under the Federal social-security system and we oppose any effort on the part of the Government to change their status in disregard of their wishes in the matter.

AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

Under the bill it is proposed to increase the Federal grants to the Under the bill it is proposed to increase the Federal grants to the States for aid to dependent children from the present one-third matching basis to a 50-50 matching basis, such as already provided under the provisions relating to grants for old-age pensions and aid to the blind. We heartly endorse this change and sincerely hope that the increased funds which will be made available to the States for this worthy purpose will be used in liberalizing present benefits and in extending aid to those now denied assistance by reason of lack of funds, rather than to relieve the States of any part of their present expenditures for such assistance. part of their present expenditures for such assistance.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

We of the Republican minority strongly urged that provision be made under the bill for increased appropriations for vocational made under the bill for increased appropriations for vocational rehabilitation, to supplement the present program of grants to the States for this great humanitarian activity, which has already retrained 120,000 crippled persons who are now gainfully employed. The relatively small amount which the Government is expending for this purpose is paying rich dividends. Not only is there a saving by reason of not having to maintain these cripples at public expense but when they are restored to gainful employment they become taxpaying citizens. become taxpaying citizens.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this is the most important bill that has been before the House at this session and the most important bill that we will be called upon to consider during the session. The fact that there are only 50 or 60 Members of the House on the floor may not be very flattering to those who are scheduled to speak, but it is flattering to the work of the Ways and Means Committee, because evidently the House is accepting, without knowing what is in this bill, the work of that committee.

The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor] told you in speaking on the rule that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand what is in the measure. He was stating the truth, and it would take a Philadelphia lawyer who had spent a good many months studying this bill if he were expected to give any intelligent opinion about it. Never in my recollection has the Ways and Means Committee so carefully considered proposed legislation. We have devoted about 4 months of hard work and study to this bill, with the hope that we could bring out a measure that would meet with the approval of the House and the country. Evidently we have succeeded for the most part, because I am sure no Member of this House who is not a member of that committee knows what is in this bill, as many are not here to hear those who have been studying the bill explain its provisions.

I shall not take your time to try to explain the many intricate provisions of this measure.

This is the most liberal social-security program ever proposed by any nation in the world, but the phase of the program that gives me, personally, the most concern-and that is its extreme liberality—has been the subject of most of the discussion so far today from the standpoint that it is not liberal enough. Of course my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, who preceded me, called to your attention the fact that this is a very liberal program, that we have gone far beyond the 1935 bill in bringing benefits to widows, to wives, to dependent children, and that we would also increase the Federal grants to a 50-50 basis for dependent children. increase the appropriation for rehabilitation, and have done various and sundry other things that will increase the cost of this program to the Federal Government; yet I anticipate that the only fight that will be made on this floor will be to still further liberalize the provisions of the bill, either because the Members will not know how liberal it already is or else because they have no proper concern for the ability of our Nation to finance present burdens and the additional burdens that will be added by this legislation.

I do not hesitate to say, and, as a matter of fact, it is already of public record in the press, I vigorously opposed the liberalized benefits portion of this bill, feeling it would be better and safer for the time being simply to freeze the payroll taxes, improve the administrative features of this law. clarify the situation as to agriculture, give an opportunity to the States to make a suitable reduction in the 3-percent tax for unemployment compensation insurance, exempt certain nonprofit organizations, commence benefit payments in 1940 instead of 1942, but defer the rest of the liberalized program until some of the shadows have lifted from the road ahead.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts has pointed out, our committee was flooded with requests from industry not to let the 50-percent increase for pay-roll taxes for old-age benefits go into effect in 1940. They said they could not stand that additional taxation and that it would result in unemployment.

We yielded to their importunities and froze that tax until 1943, but I have no assurance that the second session of the Seventy-seventh Congress may not be confronted with the same appeals that met the first session of the Seventysixth Congress. Neither do I have any assurance that the Members of that Congress will not then yield to such appeals.

The report states that in the next 5 years the increased benefits under this program, roughly, will amount to $1,200,-000,000, but that is based on what is called the intermediate estimate, and the distinguished Chairman of the Social Security Board frankly told us that so many factors enter into the matter of determining what will be the cost of this program, that it would be only safe for us to allow, in computing costs for future years, a 50-percent margin of error between the possible low and the possible high. So when the committee reports the intermediate estimate of increased costs of $1,200,000,000 for the next 5 years, you must consider in connection with appeals that will undoubtedly be made to you to increase the benefits for old age, noncontributory pensions, and to increase the contributions to the States for various and sundry things, that the cost already contemplated by this bill may far exceed our present estimates and expectations.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the distinguished chairman of my committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a fact that if we increase the liberal provisions of the bill and have the Government assume additional obligations, we might just as well get ready now to raise additional taxes to meet those obligations, because that is something that will have to be done.

Mr. ROBERTSON. There can be no doubt about that We should face this issue in a realistic manner. There is a limit to what the Government can pay, and no one can with certainty predict when the country will lose faith in Government obligations. No Member of this House should want to push the Government to the point where confidence in the Government and in Government securities would be lost. I am sorry my distinguished colleagues of the minority have seen fit to bring in partisanship, but at this point I feel I should say that we sat around the conference table in that committee for a month after the hearings had closed as free from partisan situations as any political committee could be, considering this economic question as an economic question, working together, Democrats occasionally voting for Republican motions and Republicans occasionally voting for Democratic motions-all seriously bent on the one objective, to bring out the best possible bill. I am sorry that they have seen fit to insert in the minority report reference again to the fact that the Government bonds in which this trust money will be invested are still I O U's. I do not know exactly what an I O U is, but I have always thought it is more or less in the nature of what they call in China a chit—something scratched on a piece of paper, "I will pay you if, as, and when—but I owe you so much." The bonds into which this trust fund will be invested are the same bonds in which we have always invested all of the annuity and retirement fund for the civil-service employees, bonds of our Postal Savings and all other savings of that kind—the very same kind of bonds. Let no concern be given by anyone on that point, but I do strongly urge that when we start reading this bill under the 5-minute rule for amendments you resist the temptation to further load this bill down with amendments that would increase its cost to the Government. to the taxpayers, and maybe finally to the undoing of us all.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have heard some complaint about the law as it is now from the employers. For instance, they contribute to this fund. I have heard them say, "Suppose that one of us goes broke, suppose an employer goes broke and he has contributed to this fund for years, what benefits does he get?"

Mr. ROBERTSON. This fund is not set up for the protection of the employers, but it is for the protection of the employees, and if the employer goes broke, the employee still has to his credit what he has put into this fund and it is as safe as wheat in the mill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Can he get anything back?

Mr. ROBERTSON. He can get it back when he reaches the retirement age.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not until then?

Mr. ROBERTSON. He cannot get an immediate cash payment, and nobody can under this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it is my information on the Democratic side that we have not had applications enough for time this afternoon to scarcely run us through today, and I expect the same condition applies on the Republican side. Therefore, I see no good purpose to be served by continuing this debate, which under the rule is limited to 8 hours, and unless applications are made for time before we adjourn today, I suggest the sensible thing would be to close the general debate when the Committee rises this evening and start the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule tomorrow. I make that suggestion now so that if anyone wants to speak on the bill, he can make application for time now.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I respect the gentleman's views on all matters, of course. The suggestion he now offers would be impractical and impossible. I for one on the part of the minority have made commitments for tomorrow and the next and it would not be fair to these people to close debate tonight. Besides that, we could not do that in Committee of the Whole. I hope the gentleman will not consider bringing it up in the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I shall not insist upon it, but I think if those who are going to speak on this program are not sufficiently interested to be here when we have the bill under consideration, they might just as well insert their remarks in the Record.

Mr. TREADWAY. And may I further suggest that until this morning the committee report, containing both the majority and the minority views, was not available for general distribution to the House.

It has been impossible for our colleagues to secure copies of the reports until this morning. So, of course, it would not be fair to them to close debate today.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I realize there is merit in that suggestion, because I tried to get some extra copies of the report myself yesterday afternoon and was unable to do so.

I wish to conclude these brief observations on this bill with this very definite appeal that we do not attempt to load this bill down with one further cent of expense to the Federal Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Reed].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am only going to discuss one phase of this bill. It is one that appeals to me very deeply. It is one in which I am sure there cannot be one iota of partisanship. It would be impossible for me, in discussing it, to inject any partisanship into it. I think it is a phase of this bill that comes very close to the heart of every American citizen.

The reason I am going to discuss it is because I think a record should be made outside of the printed reports from the various bureaus, which oftentimes do not reach the public. I refer to the subject of rehabilitation of persons crippled in industry or otherwise. This subject, I am sure, will interest the public, and I believe that in due time the program to promote it will be greatly extended.

If you are in possession of the majority report of the committee, you will find on page 3 rather a brief reference to rehabilitation. You will notice by the report that in this bill there has been authorized an appropriation of $1,000,000 to increase the work of vocational rehabilitation. It is an increase from $1,938,000 to $2,938,000.

The history of rehabilitation is very interesting. I am going to trace it very briefly. I suppose the reason for my great interest in this subject is because I came in touch with it almost by accident.

In 1917 I had the privilege of being in France and while in the city of Paris a fine old French professor named Doleans was very insistent that I go out to the National Agricultural School or University located at Grignon. I hesitated about going because the war was on and there were things to be done. It occurred to me there would be no students in the university, because all the young men, especially of student age, were in the army. But as a matter of courtesy I went out to this old National University. and much to my surprise found that the domitories were all occupied by injured soldiers. It was a beautiful old educational institution located on 600 acres of land, enclosed with a stone wall. The buildings were beautiful and serviceable. There were the usual classrooms, lecture rooms. These soldiers, practically every one of them had earned a distinguished service medal for heroism on the field of battle. I saw men there with their legs off. I saw men with their arms off. I saw the blind. I saw them injured in every conceivable way by the terrible instrumentalities of modern war. With the exception of a few men, I found them very cheerful and contented, because they were taking courses in the university to prepare them, regardless of their physical handicaps, to go back to their own communities and be self-respecting, self-sufficient, and self-supporting \

I became so interested that I made a most careful study of the whole situation and reduced it to writing. I made a list of the various activities there. There were the workshops, the laboratories, animal husbandry, dairying, fine barracks, recreation, chapel, a host of other activities; even the training of sheep dogs. Classes in all of these various activities.

I saw large classes where they were studying the tractorhow to operate it; men with perhaps one leg driving a tractor. There were lecture halls where others were studying the mechanism of tractors. I saw others learning to make cheese and butter, to go back to their own localities to earn a livelihood. There were coopers being trained to make casks and barrels for the wine sections of France. So I might go on almost indefinitely with a large list of things which they were teaching the physically handicapped men.

It was an inspirational sight, because I saw old professors there taking the blind up to the chapel. These blind boys had become a little blue and discouraged. They had blind men who had been blind all their lives leading them up to the chapel to hear fine music. They were telling the boys what a joy it was to be blind and how much they could get out of life. It was humanitarian in every respect.

I made complete notes. I came home in January 1918 and made a full report to the United States Government. Just how much influence that report might have had on subsequent legislation I do not know, and it is of little importance.

The fact is that a very fine Senator from Georgia, Senator Hoke Smith, introduced a bill embodying a rehabilitation program for the soldiers. He also had in mind including in that bill persons employed in industry, but he omitted this feature, thinking that perhaps the public mind was not quite attuned to such a program. You will all be interested to know that a companion bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by our distinguished Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. The civilian rehabilitation bills introduced by Senator Hoke Smith in the Senate and by Representative WILLIAM BANKHEAD, of Alabama, did not pass the Sixty-fifth Congress. These bills, however, were reintroduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress by Senator Smith and Representative Fess. These measures became law on June 2, 1920. I may say in this connection that rehabilitation of soldiers was a direct Federal responsibility, but under the civilian act the responsibility of carrying out the work was placed upon the States, although on a 50-50 contribution plan.

I had one experience which I recited to the committee the other day. It was rather interesting, but it shows just how these things sometimes appeal to the man who is discouraged and feels that there is no hope left for him in life. In the early days of the war there was an Irish boy located out at Walter Reed Hospital. He was a lad from my own district, who was injured. In those days, you know, we were very thoughtful of the soldiers in the hospitals-far more so than we are today; our sense of pity was very keen; we had not forgotten to visit them in those days. I drove out to Walter Reed Hospital to take this young man from my district for a ride and told him he could bring along a buddy. When we got out there on a bright Sunday morning the lad from my district came out, but he said, "My buddy is inside, and I guess you will have to help him." I went inside and found a smiling young man with both legs off fairly close to the hips. I tucked him under my arm, took him out, put him in the car, and we went for a drive. I asked them where they would like to go, and strange enough they wanted to go to Arlington Cemetery. We went through Arlington Cemetery and then went to a hotel and had dinner. Then I sat down and visited with this young man who had lost his legs, and I said: "What are you going to do now?"

"Oh," he said, "I am going to get along fine. I am rather a lucky fellow."

I said, "How is that?"

"Well," he said, "the Government is going to give me a worked in the railroad yards in my home town and helped my mother, and I never could get the education I wanted, but the Government is going to give me a chance. I think I am pretty lucky."

I said, "My boy, I think the American people are lucky to have boys like you, with your spirit."

Then he said, "You know, these girls are funny ones, aren't

I said, "How is that?"

"Well," he said, "you know I was going with a girl, but when I lost my legs I figured that she would not want me any more, so I was not going to bother her, because she liked to dance, and I would not be able to dance, but," he said, "when I got back she seemed to like me better than ever, and you know we are going to be married."

Several years later I was invited to speak in his home town. When the committee met me at the station I asked them about this boy, and they said they would take me up to see him. When I went up to see him he was occupying his own office. He was running a fine business. He was very glad to see me. He walked out on artificial limbs, happy and smiling as usual, told me he had made a success, married the girl, that he had a home, and that was paid for. Then he hauled out of his pocket and displayed a license authorizing him to drive his Cadillac car which he owned. A special license had been issued to him by Governor Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, and he was very proud of the distinction.

Thousands of soldiers were rehabilitated under that act which was later extended to cover persons injured in industry. The work proceeded rather slowly at first. Later, I was chairman of the Committee on Education and I handled a great deal of this legislation in the early days and watched with interest the results. I am going to make a long story short. I just want to remind you that since then, in extending it to persons injured in industry, 120,000 hopeless, helpless cripples have been retrained, rehabilitated, and placed in gainful occupations.

The gentleman from Virginia deplored the fact that there might be some liberalization of this bill. I do not know of anybody who will hew closer to the line when it comes to saving money than I will, but there are certain types of expenditure which are an investment. If you want to figure it in dollars and cents and leave out the human aspects, these 120,000 people who have been retrained, rehabilitated, and put back in gainful occupation, had they become objects of charity would have cost this country as a whole, at least the communities, at the very minimum $60,000,000 every single year to maintain them. To retrain them cost about $300 on the average. You will be interested to know that Henry Ford employs over 11,500 of these people, many of whom are blind. Industry has cooperated throughout the country; and what a challenge, gentlemen, today when you see the strikes, when you see the violence, when you see one group of labor arrayed against another, when you see 11,-000,000 men walking the street, when you realize that 120,000 hopeless, helpless cripples are earning their own way and supporting their families, what a challenge in this great land of opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. How many years did it take to rehabilitate these 120,000 people?

Mr. REED of New York. That has been done since 1923. Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I served side by side with the gentleman on the committee that promoted this legislation that has reclaimed crippled men in industry.

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I have taken no part in any legislation that I felt better over than that particular legislation. I have always admired the gentleman's wonderful course in school. I have always wanted to go to school. I | service and leadership in helping reclaim people crippled in industry instead of throwing them on the scrap heap. I want to express again my appreciation for his long years of service along that line.

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Along the line of what the gentleman from Kentucky has just said, may I say that when I first came to Congress some 15 years ago the first recollection I have of the gentleman who is speaking, Mr. REED of New York, was his eloquent presentation when he was a pioneer in this movement to rehabilitate disabled persons.

If he never does any more, the American people owe him a debt of gratitude that they can never pay him because he started this activity which has had such a beneficent effect on people who need help. I cannot let this opportunity go by without interpolating and stating how much good I have received out of it and how proud I have been to vote at every opportunity to increase expenditures to extend this fine work.

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman mentioned the name of Henry Ford. Does the gentleman know that in Mr. Ford's factory at Dearborn, Mich., he has working for him many thousands of men between the ages of 50 and 70?

Mr. REED of New York. And 80.

Mr. DONDERO. And some 80 years old?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of Congress come in many times for a great deal of criticism.

I find that there are employed in the Ford factory a great many of these men, and I mention the Ford plant because he employs so many of these people, but there are many other industries doing likewise. You cannot realize what these men have had to overcome. Some of these men were armless, legless, some suffering from heart disease, tuberculosis, and from many other physical and organic difficulties. Here is a list of over 500 workers in one plant 30 percent of whom in this one plant fall in this class of disabled.

If you will go into that factory you will see the blind putting washers on bolts. They are perfectly happy. You will see men with crutches leading the blind to work. There was a group in the 30 percent, above referred to, who turned out 10,000 technical pieces for automobiles, 7,000 distributor assemblies, and 8,500 automobile horns and switches.

Mr. Chairman, there is a strange thing about these people. Do you know that they have less time off on sick leave than those who are physically sound? Just keep in mind every one of them is earning a full day's pay for a full day's work, supporting himself and in many instances his family. I want that to soak into this country. These physically handicapped go-getters seem to get jobs. Certainly these crippled, blind, helpless people when they are retrained and given the opportunity go out and get work and make good.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. May I say at this point that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] was very insistent before the committee when this matter was under consideration to increase the amount by $1,000,000. No doubt the information he gave to the committee, he having had some experience with the matter, was very persuasive in securing an increase in the authorization contained in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and may I say that all credit is due the majority side because it was by unanimous vote of the committee that this $1,000,000 was put in here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I intended to go through the various States and make a few remarks touching each one of them, but time will not permit. In Illinois in 1 year there were placed in gainful occupations 5,885 persons who were once hopeless, helpless cripples, subjects for charity. Those people are engaged in 500 different kinds of employment.

In 15 months in California there were placed 1,392 handicapped persons in 90 different occupations. Illinois had 329 victims of industrial accidents, and I want you to listen to this, if you please. As normal workers they average $726 yearly. Retrained they earned on an average $1,292.

I am going to conclude with a little story. When we approach sound legislation, legislation by which we are really making an investment, I do not care what the papers or magazines say about the Members of Congress, I want every Member of the House to receive credit for some of the hard legislative work which he performs.

I remember years ago reading a poem by Anton Chester. I am not going to recite it. He had been over in the Far East where they make these marvelous tapestries and oriental rugs. He wrote a poem entitled, "The Weavers." There out on the burning sands he found these looms set up where women and children were tying thousands of knots to the square inch, working from a blueprint, working from the under side and standing in most awkward and painful positions from sunrise to sunset.

They were working day in and day out, month in and month out, year in and year out, sometimes for 3, 4, or 5 years, to make these beautiful tapestries and rugs you see on the floors and on the walls of your museums, your art galleries, and palatial homes. The master weaver left them with a blueprint; but one great day came in the lives of those people that had suffered the tortures of the damned doing this work and not knowing what the result would be. That great day came when the master weaver came, because notice had been sent to him that the last knot had been tied and that the loom was to be lowered and the product of the work spread before them on the sand. There he described how they would leap with joy and the tears would roll down their cheeks as they saw the beauty of their product, a perfect piece of work that would bring joy through the years to others.

When we weave legislation that performs the work that has been done by this rehabilitation service, let us hope that some day when your work is spread out before the master weaver, or before posterity, your name, even although it may be maligned now, will be glorified and appreciated then.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Duncan].

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, there is no use in anyone attempting to explain this legislation in 15 minutes or 30 minutes. There are so many provisions of such technical character that most of us who have worked on them for a month have to think about them ourselves before we know exactly what they are about.

During the past week in this House there has been a great deal of politics played in connection with old-age pensions. A long time ago I adopted the philosophy that "I would rather have a part of something than all of nothing." It is no use for this House to think about providing relief to the aged or relief to any other group of people in this country to an extent that is beyond the financial possibilities of the taxpayers. Whenever relief is provided and whenever pensions are provided they are upon a permanent basis, you and I know that. The taxes must be raised with which to meet the obligation. It is unlike the relief appropriations we have been making. We are at least hopeful that such appropriations are temporary and will not be continuing responsibilities on this Government, but when we provide for old-age pensions, when we provide for annuities, we must realize as sensible men and women that they are continuing obligations and that this House is to be called upon to raise the taxes with which to meet the obligations.

We know that the problem of old-age pensions is with us. It came upon us rather suddenly. I believe in it, and I believe that most of the Members of this House believe in old-age pensions. Only a few years ago the aged population of this country was about 3 percent-that is, the population beyond 65 years of age. It is now more than 6 percent. In a comparatively few years, as time goes, it will have reached approximately 16 percent of the population of this Nation. By 1980 the population of the country over 60 years of age will have reached more than 25 percent of the total population, if I am not mistaken. This is a tremendous percentage of oldage population.

There is a reason for this. The birth rate in this Nation is practically static. Through medical science people are living longer than they used to live. A comparatively few years ago there were 1,000,000 immigrants coming into this country annually. So our population increased tremendously over a comparatively short period of time. This means that we are going to reach a maximum old-age population in a comparatively few years.

There are two titles to this bill, as you who have read it know, that deal with old-age problems. The first title, title I, deals with old-age assistance, old-age pensions. The second title deals with old-age and survivor benefits. The second title has been modified tremendously in the recommendations submitted by the committee. It has been liberalized beyond my fondest hope when these hearings were started, and we are informed that it will not cost any more than under exist-

Let me impress upon the members of the Committee that as title II is perfected and takes care of the increasing and approaching old-age load in this country, just so much will the responsibility for old-age assistance be modified or relieved, because, as these people who are now employed reach the age of retirement and can benefit from the provisions of title II, they will, of course, not be applicants for old-age assistance. Provision is also made for orphans and for widows so long as their children are below a certain age. This will materially aid and help the general social problem of the country.

I do want to say something to you about title I, old-age assistance. I believe in the State and Federal system. I do not believe in a national old-age pension law.

In the first place, I am a firm believer in States' rights. We have the most unusual problems in this Nation of any nation in all the world when it comes to dealing with social problems of this kind. There is just as much difference between the social, economic, and climatic conditions in Maine or northern New York or Wisconsin and those in New Mexico or Texas or California as if they were in different countries. In one section of this country the people have to dress differently than in others. They have to build against the cold; they have to buy every particle of food they eat, and it comes from some other section of the country. In other sections the people grow five or six garden crops a year and grow different types of crops. They do not have cold temperatures to contend

It may be that $10 a month would go farther in one section of the country than $50 a month would in another section of the country. It may be that an old couple living out in the country, owning a little home but having no income, could get along on $15 a month, although if the same couple were moved into the city where a house had to be rented and money had to be paid for fuel and light and other necessities, it would take $50 a month for them to get along as comfortable as they could on $10 or $15 a month, having a little property and growing a few chickens, some garden produce, and that sort of thing. So I believe the communities or the States are better qualified to determine those conditions than the Federal Government.

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding, I believe, in the States. I know there has been in my State, and applicants for old-age pensions have bitterly criticized the Social Security Board in Washington when they have been turned down because they had a little bit of property. When Dr. Altmeyer was before the committee I very definitely and specifically asked him about that question and his answer was that the States are the sole judges of the question of eligibility for old-age pensions. It is true there is written into this bill a provision that in determining the eligibility of an applicant there shall be taken into consideration the income of the applicant, but, after all, it is up to the State to determine it, and I know that it has been discussed in the Ways and Means Committee time after time. It was discussed 5 years ago and agreed by every man on the committee that it was not absolutely necessary to be in want in order to have an old-age pension.

You might have a piece of property, you might have a house and yet be eligible for an old-age pension. Some States, I admit, have attempted to say that you must be in want or in absolute need of the necessities of life before you can get a pension, but that is absolutely not required under the Federal Social Security Act.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DUNCAN. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Then as I understand the act, as administered, and as the gentleman understands it, there really is not a needs test necessarily required.

Mr. DUNCAN. Except insofar as the income of the applicant shall be taken into consideration in granting the pension, They do not have to be absolutely without everything.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is it possible to draw any line? You either have other income or you have not.

Mr. DUNCAN. I do not believe that is entirely a correct statement. I believe a person might have, as I said before, a house or probably an old person has a home, but no other income. Now, to make that old person give up that home and sell it and dispose of it in order to get an old-age pension, it seems to me would be the height of folly because to permit him to live there and give him enough to get along on would be far better than to require him to dispose of the property and give him twice or three times as much and leave him without a home, and that is not the intention. I believe, of this

Mr. BREWSTER. You do understand, then, that in its administration if any State chooses to allow a man to have a home and then a pension in addition the Federal administration will not object?

Mr. DUNCAN. That is my understanding of it, and I asked Dr. Altmeyer very definitely about it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. As a matter of fact, under the law, what constitutes need is left to the States; in other words. the Federal Government, by the Social Security Act, does not undertake to say to any State what constitutes need. For example, one State might exempt the equity in a house up to $2,000, another one $3,000, while another State might say, "No; we will allow no equity." The Federal Government does not concern itself with that, but leaves the matter entirely up to the States.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would there be any limits imposed? Suppose they gave one to John D. Rockefeller.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, there would be a limit.

Mr. BREWSTER. What is the limit? Mr. McCORMACK. This money comes out of public funds, and one of the basic requirements is need, but what is need is a question of fact for the State to determine. Of course, there are cases where it clearly goes beyond need, but so far as the Federal Government is concerned the question of need is left to the State in a very flexible manner.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. In the State of Massachusetts if one has an equity not in excess of $2,500 he is entitled to an old-age pension.

Mr. McCORMACK. And another State could enact a law permitting no equity. In other words, the Government does not go into that, but leaves it to the local legislature to meet local conditions.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DUNCAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.
Mr. BOEHNE. The bill now under consideration, may I say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Brewster], clearly specifies in lines 17 to 20-

That the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of an individual claiming old-age assistance.

Mr. BREWSTER. That would be almost contrary to what has been said here; that would look in the other direction as a mandatory requirement that they shall take that into account.

Mr. McCORMACK. The purpose of that is this: Certainly, the gentleman from Maine would not want a State to pass a law paying an old-age pension coming out of public funds to A, for example, when that same party is receiving a contributory pension under another provision of the social-security law. The gentleman would not want that, would he? In other words, the gentleman would not want a person to draw two pensions, would he?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I might say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Brewster], using it as a practical example, that in my State the court of appeals held that a man who was receiving $50 a month from his son was entitled to an old-age pension. The Federal Security Board objected to that, because it was apparent that that man was not in need of a Federal pension, when compared to others who had no such income. So that, after all, it is up to the States to determine that fact, and I make those observations so that they may be in the Record.

The testimony of Dr. Altmeyer appears in the hearings with respect to the Board's attitude on that question. I frankly feel that the pressure that has come from those seeking old-age pensions has been directed to the wrong legislative body, especially until the States match the amount of the Federal grants, and that they should go to the States where they must ultimately obtain increases in their pensions.

Mr. BREWSTER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the court in Missouri upheld that but that the Federal Security Board objected to it?

Mr. DUNCAN. The Federal Security Board contends that the courts have no authority to pass on this question of old-age pensions.

Mr. BREWSTER. They objected to it on that ground?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. And not on the other ground?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. To say that in my own State of Michigan it is permitted old people to retain a modest home, and it is left entirely to the local investigators and the local boards in the counties to determine the question of need. They are not asked to move from their home or to dispose of it.

Mr. DUNCAN. I think that is a commendable law. Mr. Chairman, we are going to be called on when we come to the reading of this bill probably to pass on a number of amendments.

I join with those who have spoken before in commending the gentlemen of the minority for the splendid cooperation they have given us, keeping politics out of the executive sessions at least. Of course we are all politicians, more or less, and in the hearings they naturally attempted to make a record. A motion was made the other day to recommit the Townsend bill back to the Ways and Means Committee, directing the committee to bring in a pension bill giving to the old folks adequate pensions. My good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] talks here about this $20 limit today. I voted for it but it does not mean anything at this time and will not until the States increase their contributions beyond the present $30 limit. Is that the type of oldage relief that our friends over here want to give, when there is only one State in the Union that is now meeting the present $15 limit? That does not mean anything. In my own State when the old-age pensions came into existence, they said we would have to have a sales tax to provide the revenue. A 1-cent sales tax was imposed. Relief got 50 percent, schools got 33 percent, and old-age pensioners got 17 percent of that tax. Two years later they increased that 1-percent tax to a 2-percent tax and the old-age pensioners are still getting 17 percent of it. The proceeds from the 2percent sales tax amounts to millions. If one-half of the effort had been directed toward inducing the legislature to give them a just proportion of that sales tax, which has been exerted in trying to get some plan here that everybody knows will never become a reality, there would be more people on the pension rolls today, and they would be getting larger pensions.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

leid?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the suggestion to raise this $20 does not mean anything? Mr. DUNCAN. It does not mean an earthly thing.

Mr. BREWSTER. Then, do I understand that the gentlemen of the majority are playing politics with this?

Mr. DUNCAN. Oh, no.

Mr. BREWSTER. I thought they were the ones who raised it to $20.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. In just a moment. The minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, I believe, boast that the minority introduced this amendment 2 years ago when this bill was under consideration. They have been urging its adoption ever since, and in their minority views contained in the present committee report they make the following statement:

When the original Social Security Act was under consideration in 1935, the Republican minority offered a motion to increase the Federal contribution to a maximum of $20, which, with a like contribution by the State, would have provided a pension of $40 per month. This motion was defeated due to the opposition of the Democratic majority.

And I say that the gentleman himself admitted that it is not going to result in any increased pensions, with the possible exception of the State of California and the State of Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. Apparently California is being held up as the only State that this amendment will benefit. Does not the gentleman realize that if the Congress takes this action it will be an incentive to every other State to increase the amount that they may appropriate out of their own funds to match the Federal funds? Does he not also realize that the legislators in the State legislatures hereafter will be put in a position where they must look to their own funds and not pass memorials and resolutions asking the Congress to pass fishy bills such as we voted down the other day?

Mr. DUNCAN. The gentleman is quite correct in his observation that the pressure which some of the legislatures, through the passing of resolutions and sending petitions to the Congress have been imposing will find the shoe on the other foot.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. When the gentleman says it does not mean anything, he means that it will not mean anything unless the legislatures of the States increase their maximum?

Mr. DUNCAN. It does not mean anything in dollars and cents right now, because the States have not yet reached the maximum. I am talking about it from a very practical standpoint. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I am introducing today a bill which has for its primary purpose the amendment of the so-called Johnson Act, which is now on the statute bocks and which prohibits further loans to nations which are in default of their honest debts to us. This bill amends the present law in two particulars. The first particular is to define the technical status of default in a way that will make it impossible for any nation making a token or part payment to us on that debt to borrow any further money from us until the full and complete payment of their overdue obligations is made.

The second particular in which this bill will amend the present act is to provide a penalty time period to run from the time that the nation in default to us makes full payment of its overdue debts under the provisions of this bill. This penalty time period will equal the period of time which the defaulting nation has taken to make up its mind to make such full payment of its long overdue obligations.

With that brief explanation, may I state, Mr. Chairman, that it is with sincere pleasure that I learn of a miraculous awakening of common honesty among the nations of Europe, a bestirring of conscience so overpowering as to cause those nations not only to remember the debts that they have owed us these many, many years, but actually to start talking about paying them. Astounding though such advices be, I am informed further that this unprecedented display of honesty is not content to find expression in words alone, but has impelled our suddenly penitent debtors to send emissaries of the bluest blood to proffer the reborn affection, to vow their undying love, and to seek to cement anew the ancient friendships.

Happy, indeed, am I, Mr. Chairman, to have lived to behold so beautiful and, shall I say, so touching a proof of the love of the Old World, to have lived to know that peaceful gestures are stylish once more where naught but contempt and scorn have reared their ugly heads these many, many years. And, most of all, am I delighted to see the spirit of common honesty restored to bestir our beloved cousins across the sea into gestures toward meeting their long-ignored obligations. Let us by all means encourage such gestures. Let us cordially welcome these emissaries. And let us joyously welcome the payments, if and when these penitents permit dollars to follow words.

Sad indeed am I, Mr. Chairman, that the ever-pressing needs of my constituents, of the poor and needy, the unemployed, the ill-fed and the ill-housed and the ill-clothed—so representative of the fruits of new dealism's planned economy in every congressional district of these United States—prohibit my participation in the glamorous and glittering and outrageously costly public welcomes accorded at the expense of our suffering people to these visiting dignitaries. Yet that sadness is salved by the knowledge that I, at least, shall escape by that absence from these undemocratic demonstrations the guilt of being party to such damnable squandering of the people's money in a land where millions of desperate citizens know naught but poverty and unemployemnt and economic agony.

No, Mr. Chairman, I cannot become a party to these public manifestations. Yet I do believe we should rejoice. And upon this momentous, this unprecedented occasion, I believe it behooves each and every one of us solemnly to review the whole history of these debts, carefully to recall the bitter lessons learned during years of impotent waiting, seriously to reflect upon the marvel of this reawakened honesty, and strongly to sniff as we seek the degree of sincerity underlying this talk of settlement.

Let us remember that the ending of the World War found Uncle Sam holding the bag to the tune of many billions of dollars owed by these very European nations whom we had saved first with our wealth and then with our armies from the fruit of their own madness. Let us not forget that during all the long years since the ending of that World War these same European nations have continued to owe us and that but one among them all, little Finland, has proven itself honorable enough to meet its obligations. These others, the great and powerful and able, have preferred to offer excuses, to pay nothing, and to scoff at Uncle Sam as the prize sucker of all time. Let us not forget that these defaulters. these dishonorable debtors, during all those years had money to lend to their neighbors, money for the building of great armaments, great navies, and great empires, but no money with which to pay their just debts to us.

Let us remember, Mr. Chairman, that this dishonest evasion continued year after sadder year, that when payments came due they were ignored by these nations, safe in their knowledge that, other than through force of arms, we were powerless to compel them to be honest. Let us not forget that year after sadder year they laughed at us and let us whistle for our money; that year after year they went on lending to others, went on lavishing wealth upon armaments and upon empire; that year after sadder year we waited in vain.

But there came a time at long last when we wearied of empty promises and lies and evasions, when we grew weary of playing the sucker role, when we let our resentment manifest itself and forbade, through the passage of the Johnson Act, all further borrowing from our Government or from our private citizens by these nations so unquestionably proven to be without honor. We reared a hedge against these defaulters. We had been flimflammed once, but were determined never to be again. And so the Johnson Act was passed so these bad debtors could borrow no more until they paid up.

Did this act of ours arouse the honesty of these branded debtors? It did not, Mr. Chairman. They preferred the stigma to the paying; preferred to let Uncle Sam go on holding the bag. They managed without borrowing more from us, and they kept what of ours they had, year after year.

Why, then, do these nations now send their emissaries, in pomp and glory, to our shores? Have they new cause to love us? Have long-calloused consciences become aware of gratitude, of common honesty, of that decency which impels honest folk to pay just debts? Have the swords of Europe turned to plowshares, the plots of wily diplomats to benedictions, the greed of war mongers and munitions makers to human kindness? Or is this newly found honesty, this suddenly refired love, this touching gesture of kingly hands across the sea but a delusion and a snare, but a cleverly conceived and cleverly camouflaged attempt to lure us again into the sucker role we played so ably and so well at the behest of these same European schemers two short decades ago?

Over in Europe today every nation bristles with the implements of organized murder, and every mother prays, dreading, as dreads every true lover of peace, the possible harvest of the morrow. Over in Europe today shrewd and ungodly worshipers of gold spin their evil webs and greedy makers of munitions, of poison gas, of all the hellish devices designed for the murdering of their fellow men, rub their hands in anticipation. Over in Europe bide wily diplomats, awaiting, insanely lusting for greater power over the lives of men. They wait, Mr. Chairman, all these unholy conspirators wait for the spark to set the dawn aflame with infernal fires. They wait, as they must, for the money without which their horrible scheming can bear no fruit. The guns stand ready, mute from the lack of gold.

As once before he stood when European war mongers cried for gold, so stands Uncle Sam today, possessed of that gold, keeper of the one thing needed to launch the carnage and the profit grabbing. Then, two decades ago, he was a gullible fool, eager to be victimized. But Uncle Sam is no longer the fool, the easily plundered. For about him stands the hedge of the Johnson Act to prohibit further picking of the old gentleman's pocket until these suddenly honest ones pay what they owe him.

To the unwary this hedge may represent security, may seem to be ample to insure the continued immunity of Uncle Sam's pocket from the greedy fingers eager to pick it again. To the unwary, these long-overdue debts and their accrued interest represent staggering sums and the unwary know these improvident debtors have no such sums with which to repay if they would. To the unwary this fact would appear to prohibit further borrowing, bar funds from the war mongers, permit no gold to be sent to set the mouths of the waiting guns abelch for many years to come. But to the knowing, to the remembering, to those unable to forget the bitter lessons of the long, long years, to those awake to the true character of those with whom we deal, to such, Mr. Chairman, a just suspicion whispers at this talk of settlement of those debts. For this talk is not of paying what is owed. It is not of meeting these obligations in full. It is not of really paying the score at all. This talk is of settlement-of buying us off for a mere fraction of what rightfully should be paid. The intent is to settle cheaply, for a mere 10 percent or less. And the true intent of it all is to tear down the hedge of the Johnson Act and open the way to make suckers of the American people all over again.

What intelligent American can doubt it?

And what intelligent American, guiltless of ulterior motive, is willing to see that hedge destroyed, that safeguard removed, as may become reality should this administration or any succeeding one accept such picayune settlement and clear the way for the raiding? What intelligent American wants to send our wealth again to the war mongers of Europe, to set afiame the seething hell of hates and touch off the volcano of destruction?

Not one, Mr. Chairman, I am certain. And because I am so certain, I am proposing this amendment to the Johnson Act to provide that, in the event of any settlement, in whole or in part, of any of these previously defaulted war debts, the restrictions against further borrowing shall remain in force until such time shall elapse thereafter as did elapse between the date the debt was due and the date upon which actual settlement was made.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, if a defaulter required 10 or 15 or 20 years to become honest enough to pay and now does make settlement, let that defaulter prove good faith by remaining honest for 10 or 15 or 20 years, as the case may be, before asking for our trust again. [Applause.]

If these suddenly honest European nations intend no harm, the enactment into law of this proposed amendment will not deter them from settling. If they sincerely want to square up, even though they pay but a fraction of the true score, fine. Let us welcome them and their token of reawakened honesty. Let us forgive. But let us not forget, nor permit them to forget, that we waited many, many years for them to become honest enough to want to pay, that we taxed that money from our own suffering people; that money which, had these Europeans discovered honor sooner, we could have used most profitably in our own battles against our own enemies of destitution and unemployment and similar economic torments now assailing us. Let them remember as we so long have remembered. And then let them wait as long as waited we before they may borrow more and are tempted to abandon this miraculous new morality of theirs and scheme again to squandor first our money for their warring and then the flower of our manhood to snatch them from their selfdug pit. [Applause.]

Over there they cannot fight without money. The enactment into law of this amendment to the Johnson Act would nip in the bud any scheme of the European sly ones to inveigle the administration into destroying the protection of the Johnson Act by accepting a pittance in lieu of the rightful amounts justly due us and so opening the way for another raid upon our wealth. Over there the guns stand waiting, mute for the lack of gold. How better to preserve the peace of the world than by keeping our gold over here?

That, Mr. Chairman, is the purpose of this proposed amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to make a speech. I am going to open a few oysters and hope we may find a pearl somewhere in them.

It is very certain that the Government of the United States has gone into the insurance business in a big way. Somebody has asked for it. The people are going to get it. So I think we ought to examine the system a little and find out some of the things about it. In this little discussion that I hope to make, I invite interruption by members of the Ways and Means Committee, and I hope they will prove me wrong or right, as the case may be.

In the first place, the Government being in the insurance business, are these payments that the people make under the Social Security Act actually taxes or are they premiums on insurance? If you consider them taxes, most certainly the Federal Government has a right to do with them as it sees fit. I understand that the Federal Government is taking so-called taxes that are supposed to apply as insurance premiums, as I see them, and using them for very different purposes.

For example, I ask the gentleman from California, a member of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. Buck] to correct me, if he will: On the subject of the taxes that are paid by people who pay social security taxes. As I understand it, those taxes, in addition to being insurance premiums for their own benefit, are for the purpose of aiding the needy aged all over the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman is referring to the pay-roll tax?

Mr. HINSHAW. To the social-security taxes for retirement purposes; yes.

Mr. BUCK. They have no relationship whatever to the aid of the needy in the United States. They are taxes which are general taxes and covered into the Treasury of the United States. The Congress is authorized to appropriate, or appropriates, if this bill is adopted, an amount equivalent to those taxes to a fund which will be available for the payment of contributory benefits. Those old-age insurance benefits have nothing to do with the question of need. A man who is entitled to a contributory benefit has earned it on the basis of his wage record as a matter of right.

Mr. HINSHAW. I understand that, but, on the other hand, from the contributions that are made through social-security taxes, part by the employee and part by the employer, which are paid into the Treasury of the United States, do we then appropriate from this fund to the aid of the needy aged?

Mr. BUCK. Not a penny. The appropriations are made from the general funds of the United States Treasury.

Mr. HINSHAW. You mean that the appropriations to the needy aged do not come from the social-security taxes?

Mr. BUCK. They do not; not one cent.

Mr. HINSHAW. In other words, all of the funds appropriated under the social-security pay-roll taxes are paid out directly to those who contributed?

Mr. BUCK. Let me explain this again for the benefit of the gentleman from California as well as those gentlemen listening here. Benefit payments under the contributory system—title II—are made to those who have established wage records up to the time they become 65 or who are entitled to receive benefits when they cease work after 65. Under the terms of the bill that money is paid, of course, only to those specified. That money is appropriated by the Congress annually from the general funds of the Treasury. If this bill is adopted, Congress appropriates annually an amount equal to the money received from the contributions from pay-roll taxes paid by employers and employees so that all of the money thus received will go into this new trust fund. In other words, whatever money is appropriated for the care of the needy under title I—that is, payments to States to match aid that they themselves give to the aged needy—comes out of the general funds of the Treasury and has no relationship whatsoever to the employer and employee pay-roll taxes.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman means to say, then, that the budget as set up under the Social Security Act here—that is, the entire income of the act—is used for the purposes of the act exclusive of the aid to the needy aged?

Mr. BUCK. Exactly; it will be if the pending bill is adopted.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then the aid to the needy aged comes from some other form of taxation than the social-security taxes?

Mr. BUCK. It comes from the general funds of the Treasury. I cannot tell the gentleman any more than that. I cannot tell him whether it comes from excise taxes, liquor taxes, customs receipts, or any other special tax. It comes, if I may say so, from the same funds as do the appropriations for the War Department, the Treasury Department, or any other appropriation.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is very interesting to me. I had understood that the budget of the Social Security Act applied also to the needy aged.

Mr. BUCK. I am very glad to correct the gentleman's impression because I want him and everyone else in the House to understand that the funds authorized to be appropriated under title I and subsequently appropriated by the Congress have nothing whatsoever to do with the employer and employee pay-roll taxes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. The gentleman would do well to make clear that the funds which have been paid in for pay-roll taxes go into the general funds of the Treasury.

Mr. BUCK. I think I have made that clear.

Mr. BREWSTER. The gentleman has not made that clear to us.

Mr. BUCK. I certainly think I have made that clear to everybody.

Mr. BREWSTER. And that old-age assistance is then taken out of the general fund; in other words, there has been a great deal of more or less partisan argument about this question of what becomes of the pay-roll taxes; but it is true that 80 percent of the pay-roll taxes have not gone for the purpose for which they were paid, but have gone—

Mr. BUCK. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BREWSTER. The gentleman from California [Mr. Hinshaw] yielded to me, I believe—but have gone into the general funds of the Treasury and those funds have then been paid out so that 40 years from now when it is necessary for our successors to pay the contributory pensions the people of this country have got to be taxed again to pay the old-age pensions. Is not that correct?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman is in entire error and I am going to refer him—

Mr. BREWSTER. I shall be very glad to be educated.

Mr. BUCK. Just a minute—I refer the gentleman to the remarks I made on the floor on the 6th day of April which are contained in the Congressional Record. They are rather long and are exhaustive on this subject. They were referred to by the chairman of the committee during his discussion this morning. I think if the gentleman will read them he will understand just what happens to these funds and what the situation is.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think I do understand, and I think I have stated it absolutely correctly.

Mr. BUCK. Why, my dear friend, with all due respect, you have stated them absolutely incorrectly.

Mr. BREWSTER. This year you are going to collect $750,000,000 in pay-roll taxes. Is that approximately right?
Mr. BUCK. I do not know what the exact sum will be.

Mr. BREWSTER. Let us take that as an approximate figure.

Mr. BUCK. We will say approximately that.

Mr. BREWSTER. What is is going to become of the $750,000,000 which will be paid this year?

Mr. BUCK. That will go into the general funds of the Treasury. The Congress, if this bill is passed, appropriates by it an amount equivalent to the $750,000,000, if that be the correct figure, to this trust fund that is set up where it will be invested for the benefit of future annuitants.

Mr. BREWSTER. That does not follow the funds to their disbursement. Who gets the $750,000,000 that is paid in this year? Who gets the money?

Mr. BUCK. The trust fund.

Mr. BREWSTER. The gentleman does not mean to say that the $750,000,000 in cash is going to be put in a strong-box somewhere, does he?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman is not using his head at all on this matter.

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not wonder the gentleman wishes to extricate himself from his difficulty.

Mr. BUCK. I have no difficulty at all. The gentleman is wandering in a fog of financial mist.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think we are all rather in a fog.

Mr. BUCK. I want to read the gentleman a portion of the bill if he will yield, and if he needs more time I will yield it to him.

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. I want to read a portion of section 201 (a) of the bill before us, which makes a definite appropriation to the trust fund that is created:

There is hereby appropriated to the trust fund for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for each fiscal year thereafter, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, amounts equivalent to 100 percent of the taxes, including interest, penalties, and additions to the taxes received under the Federal Insurance Contribution Act covered into the Treasury.

If the gentleman agrees with me that that is a proper policy, he ought to vote for that provision when we come to it in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I am very much concerned over this matter, coming from the State of California, where we pay higher old-age assistance payments than any other State in the Union. We are in the position there of paying some $32 or $33 per month on the average to the needy aged, about half of which comes from taxation of real estate. It involves a terrific burden on our people out there trying to live up to the aspirations of the Social Security Act. We find that something like 43 percent of our county budgets, which are twice as big as they ever were before, goes for various purposes such as this, but very largely for this particular purpose. Under the circumstances, while we may be encouraged to pay higher old-age pensions, under this system it is going to be a terrific burden upon those who own their own homes and the places in which they do business.

I would like to call attention to one other thing. If a person has an average monthly wage of $100 a month, which is in excess of the average wage of the people of the United States, after 40 years steady work at $100 per month, he will be able to receive $35 per month under the Social Security Act. We in California are paying something like $33 a month already. This fellow will have to wait 40 years in order to get $35. It seems to me he would rather go on the county- and State-aid program when it comes time for this thing to happen. That will be one of the principal difficulties of the whole scheme, as I see it. In 5 years they will be able to get only $26.25 under the Social Security Act, while already in California they are paying something like $33. Why should he not take this pension under the needy aged program in the State of California? It pays more.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one-half minute.

Mr. Chairman, the reason is he will obtain his $35 or whatever he may get under title II as a matter of right. He does not have to give up one cent. He may have $10,000 worth of property or $50,000 worth of property. paid according to his wage record. He cannot obtain oldage assistance unless he gives up everything he possesses.

Mr. HINSHAW. Exactly so, and what are our needy aged going to do in the meantime, and what is the real property taxpayer going to do? Both are sunk.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobbs].

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I hope no one here will think I am speaking in anything but the best spirit. I am not seeking to fan the embers of old fires nor to open old wounds. I am not the least bit peeved. I am in perfectly good humor. But I wish to analyze this bill from the standpoint of that region which I love best of all on this earth.

Since Alexander Hamilton advocated and the Republican Party inflicted upon the farmers of the Nation the steal of the high protective tariff, we have had an average of 45 percent of the money we spend in the South taken away from us by that iniquitous exaction.

Although cotton is responsible for every dime of the trade balance in favor of America, except $2,000,000,000, in all the 150 years of the history of this Government—thirty-three out of the thirty-five billion dollars-yet the region which produced all of that cotton has not even one slick, thin dime of that $35,000,000,000 of favorable trade balance to show for the sweat, blood, brains, brawn, and natural resources that went into it.

There never was one slave ship that sailed from a southern port under southern capital. Every slave that was brought to this country came in a New England bottom. My father was a Maine Yankee, so I am not in the least bit antagonistic toward that section. Thank God, my father got religion and served in the army of the Confederacy, but he still admitted being born in Maine.

New England is a great region. Its people are smart and probably no more selfish than the rest of us. I might have done exactly what they did had I been in their shoes, but the fact remains that they stole slaves in Africa, brought them here, and enslaved them. When it proved to be unprofitable for them to work those slaves, they sold them to the South. It then became a heinous crime to own slaves, although slavery was a recognized institution, guaranteed in the Constitution of the United States. Abolition became thoroughly moral. They did not wage the War Between the States to take back the slaves that New England stole and sold to us. That was not the purpose of the war. They did not want them, for they could not use them profitably. They simply did not wish us to have them. The purpose of the war was economic, because one smart Yankee came down South and multiplied the value of those slaves that New England sold us until the average value went from $200, the price we paid, to $2,000. When Mr. Eli Whitney did that with the cotton gin, our New England friends could not stand it.

Mr. Chairman, in that war there were only three plotted paths of destruction-to Atlanta, the railroad center, to New Orleans and Mobile. My home town, Selma, Ala., was marked for destruction because there was there located the second largest arsenal of the Confederacy. Although there were only three plotted paths of destruction, there was not left in the whole South two bricks standing on one another in an industrial institution. Of course they burned libraries and universities also, but that was a mere passing fantasy.

They not only destroyed our homes and every industrial establishment, took the economic treasure of our slaves, but, at the point of the bayonet, they held elections which sent our former slaves to our legislatures to pile up our State debts for railways which frequently were never built. Under much of such debt we still groan. Then they added to the iniquity of the protective tariff discriminatory freight rates.

I realize that the Interstate Commerce Commission can and will work out the steal from freight-rate structures, eventually. There is hope of justice to be attained gradually, in the not too distant future. But tariff levies and discriminatory freight rates are only minor calamities compared with the devastation continually wrought for the farmers by price fixing, coming and going.

The farmer is the only man in America who has not one word to say about the price of his products. The manufacturers fix the price of plow points and everything else they sell us, but they also fix the price of our cotton, our corn, our wheat, and all other agricultural commodities.

There could not be a vacuum cleaner for money, sucking it out of the pockets of the producers, any more effective than this beautiful price-fixing system that has been going merrily on all these years. But in spite of all these handicaps there has been some modicum of success. We have come back to some extent.

So then the Civil War was reopened under the guise of regulating wages and hours, but really seeking to get back the shoe business from St. Louis and the cotton mills from the South. There was no other reason for the wage-hour bill which was enacted, but to try again to destroy industry in the South and drive us further back into peonage. It is said to the South: Get back between the plow handles, produce the raw product, ship it north under a discriminatory freight rate, there, behind a high tariff wall, we will manufacture it into products to be shipped back under preferential freight rates, and sold to you feudal slaves of our economic system at whatever prices we think the traffic will bear.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOBBS. It gives me pleasure always to yield to the genial gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. It ought not to be overlooked, ought it, that the wage and hour bill to which the gentleman is referring, was fathered by a distinguished Senator of his own State?

Mr. HOBBS. I will say in answer to that that the wage and hour bill that was fathered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama is not the one that was adopted, nor was it anything like the one that did pass.

Mr. MAPES. But it had its genesis there, did it not?

Mr. HOBBS. Possibly so, but that first bill put a ceiling to wages and a floor to hours, instead of the reverse, and my recollection is that it provided for differentials.

Then we come to the social-security bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOBBS. I gladly yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. It has always been the tendency in science to go from diversity to unity, and every great economist has always formulated every rule on the basis of going from diversity to unity. Does the distinguished gentleman, for whom I have a wholesome respect, believe that we ought to have 48 different levels of minimum wages in the 48 States and that human beings should be exploited at wages no human being should receive, or should there be one uniform law providing for a minimum wage that would enable every small working man to have purchasing and consuming power?

Mr. HOBBS. I appreciate the question and I wish I had time to answer it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. I appreciate the question and I favor exactly what the gentleman has so eloquently described, but that is not what we have. The wage-hour law, the monstrosity on the statute books today, does nothing of the kind. It excluded from its operation 58,000,000 out of 60,000,000 workers. It did not have the nerve, because of political prostitution, to touch the two most underpaid elements of our cititzenry, to wit, domestic servants and farm labor. What I favor is not increasing the existing disparity, but leveling up the farmer and farm laborer to parity with industrial labor and then raising the pay of all, till every worker shall be receiving as high a wage as possible.

We will never have prosperity in this country as long as the average wage on the farm in Alabama is $91 per annum. You should not continue this peonage.

I am going to offer an amendment to this bill in due season, which will tend to give some substance to the beautiful dreams born of title I of the social-security law. In Alabama and many other States the old-age assistance feature of this law is but a cruel joke. Not one in a hundred of those aged supposed-to-be beneficiaries under title I, is now eligible under the law some States have been forced by their poverty to pass. And those few get, not $30 a month, but $9. The total budget of our State for all purposes, excluding "earmarked" funds, is about $6,000,000, and you say, "Appropriate $15 a month and we will match it." That would take $27,000,000 a year for Alabama's part, under title I alone. It is bad enough to be poor, but it is adding insult to injury when you laugh at our poverty.

But even this is not the worst. By the passage of this bill the South will be driven even deeper into peonage. We cannot participate to any appreciable extent, yet we pay our full share, in proportion to our wealth, of the taxes that foot the bill for California and New York and these other States that are able to obtain this Federal largess for their aged citizens by matching dollar for dollar.

These gentlemen who boast of how much North Carolina pays to the Federal Government or how much New York pays, are fundamentally erroneous in this regard. Although they buy the stamps and put them on their cigarettes and their tins of tobacco, Alabama smokes the cigarettes and smokes the pipe tobacco. We smoke the Pittsburgh and the Wheeling stogies. Thus, we pay our part of that indirect tax, although North Carolina and these other places claim full credit because they actually buy the revenue stamps.

They buy the stamps, but mainly with outside money. Alabama will pay her full part of every dollar that goes out of the Federal Treasury under the Social Security Act, but will not get one mill of benefit per dollar of her contribution.

Verily, "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath."

My amendment provides that in aid of those States who do their best, but cannot match enough of the Federal funds to give their eligible aged $15 per month, the National Government shall contribute $2 for every $1 of State contribution until a monthly payment of $15 is assured. This will give us in Alabama, on the basis of our present contribution, $13.50 per month for each of the aged who have been certified as being eligible. This is the only way we can get even that much.

Why protest friendship for the aged and a desire to help? Why make stump speeches the preamble to such acts about what you are going to do, and then deny the real needy of this country, who are on the sunset slope, going down into oblivion, any fruition of the hope you create? The aged in the poverty-stricken States are asking for bread, will you continue to give them a stone? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Norrell].

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, but for my interest in the welfare of the aged and the other beneficiaries under this bill, I would not attempt to say anything at this time. I am fully aware of the tradition that a new Member of Congress should not be very conspicuous in the Well of the House. I have religiously lived up to the tradition, but my interest in this bill necessitates my coming before you and saying something with reference to it.

It is my hope that when we come to passing legislation dealing with human need we can forget the section of the country from which we come. It is all right when we are dealing with property matters to try to do the best we can for our respective districts, though there should be a limit to that. I feel that when we come to legislating relief to the aged and the other classes to which this bill extends, we should deal with all the people of the country alike. I am not going to appeal to you to make large appropriations for the aged of the South because of the many inequalities that exist as between different sections of the country. I am not going to try to arouse your passion, if I could, with reference to any of these inequalities as we see them, but I feel that when it comes to dealing with old-age pensions we should realize that we are dealing with citizens of the United States. Their relief ought to be upon two bases: First, citizenship; and second, need.

A needy citizen of one State is entitled under his Federal constitutional rights to the same treatment as a needy citizen of another State. It is not right for the United States Government, in the face of the preamble to the Constitution with reference to welfare, in the face of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and in the face of the other constitutional provisions, to say to a citizen of the United States in one State that he shall be treated differently from a citizen in any other State. If we pay $20 a month to a citizen of one State, we should pay $20 per month

I propose to offer an amendment at the proper time providing that whatever the Federal Government may give shall be given alike to all needy aged throughout this great Nation. We have gotten away from the Civil War; we are no longer fighting those battles. We in the South, the North, the East, and the West recognize today that this is one great country, not split up into 48 subdivisions in matter of human need. Let us legislate upon this basis, and on this theory I want to see this Congress, if you please, pass some legislation dealing with human need and providing allotment of the largest possible pension, payable to the needy aged alike, regardless of what the State of his or her residence may pay.

Talk about economy. Yes; I believe in economy, but when this Government is able to spend billions for national defense, when this Government is able to spend millions for the conservation of the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, and the fish of the sea, I say we should spend as much as possible for the welfare and comfort of our aged citizens, and I shall offer an amendment to page 3 of the bill to provide an outright pension of $15 per person to each needy aged person under the provisions of the bill, regardless of place of residence and contribution of such State.

dence and contribution of such State.

[Here the gavel fell.]

to citizens in all States.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. NORRELL. I am going to do this, Mr. Chairman, on the theory that the Federal Government can pay it. You are increasing the allocation of money to $20. The law now provides a maximum of $15. If we as a nation are able to increase the maximum amount for pension purposes, we ought to equalize it to some degree, anyway; so I shall offer an amendment to provide up to $15 a month. If we are not able to pay that much, let us pay $10 a month, or $7.50 a month, but pay it alike to all of these grand old men and women who are going down the western slope of life. I thank you. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Warren, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6635) to amend the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the request of gentleman from Massachusetts was?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] restate his request?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, my request was that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the minority views on the Social Security Act.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I certainly want to give the minority every possible consideration in presenting their views, but if we consent to that we shall have to insist that the entire report, both majority and minority, be printed.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Has not consent already been given?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from California was endeavoring to learn what the request was.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The consent was given, and another gentleman had propounded a unanimous-consent request which was granted afterward.

Mr. BUCK. The Speaker recognized the other gentleman while I was on my feet.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The Record will speak for

SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL CONTENTS OF BILL

TAXES

1. The old-age insurance tax has been frozen at 1 percent on the worker and 1 percent on the employer for the 3 years 1940, 1941, and 1942 as against the $1\frac{1}{2}$ -percent rates on each under the present act. This will save employers and workers about \$275,000,000 change during 1940. This may save employers from \$200,000,000 to \$250,000,000 during 1940 if the States reduce their contribution rates from an average of 2.7 to 2 percent.

3. Only the first $3,000 an employer pays an employee for a year is taxed under the unemployment-compensation provisions. This is already the case in old-age insurance. This will save employers about $65,000,000 a year.

4. Provision is made for refunds and abatements to employers who paid their 1936, 1937, and 1938 unemployment-compensation contributions late to the States. This will save employers about $15,000,000.

5. Thus the savings above mentioned, through 1940, may aggregate some $530,000,000. In addition, such savings for the ensuing 2 years may amount to approximately $1,130,000,000. This represents total savings of approximately $1,710,000,000.

BENEFITS

The old-age insurance benefits have been liberalized, benefits provided for aged wives, and for widows, children, and aged dependent parents, and the date for beginning monthly benefit payments has been advanced to January 1, 1940. About $1,755,000,000 in benefits is estimated to be disbursed during 1940-44, or about $1,200,000,000 above what it is estimated would be spent under existing law during these 5 years.

The total cost of these benefits over the next 45 years will be about the same as the cost of the present benefits would be during that period of time. Of course, the cost in the early years will be more but the cost in the later years will be less.

COVERAGE

1. Certain services, including services for agricultural and horticultural associations, voluntary employees' beneficiary associations, local or ritualistic services for fraternal beneficiary societies, and services of employees earning nominal amounts (less than $45 per quarter) of nonprofit institutions exempt from income tax, are exempted from old-age insurance and unemployment compensations of the product of the produc tion in order to eliminate the nuisance cases of inconsequential tax payments.

2. The term "agricultural labor" is defined so as to clarify its meaning and to extend the exemption to certain types of service which, although not at present exempt, are an integral part of farming activities

3. About 1,100,000 additional persons (seamen, bank employees, and employed persons age 65 and over) are brought under the oldage insurance system and about 200,000 under unemployment insurance (chiefly bank employees).

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Provision is made for a $1,000,000-per-year increase in the authorization for Federal grants to the States for vocational rehabilitation This will increase the present Federal authorization from $1,938,000 to $2,938,000.

ADMINISTRATION

1. A Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund is created

1. A Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund is created for safeguarding the insurance benefit funds. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board are made trustees of this fund.

2. Provision is made to restrict the use of information concerning recipients of State old-age assistance (particularly their names and addresses) to purposes directly connected with the administration of such as a sesistance. This is designed to prevent the use of such old-age assistance. This is designed to prevent the use of such information for political and commercial purposes.

3. Other amendments are recommended to simplify and clarify administration of the law.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION

The Social Security Act became law on August 14, 1935, after many months of deliberation in Congress. The bill was passed by an overwhelming majority in both the House and the Senate, the votes being 372 to 33 and 77 to 6, respectively. The insurance provisions of the act (substantially as reported out by this committee) were upheld by the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Steward Machine Co. v. Davis (301 U. S. 548); Helvering v. Davis (301 U. S. 619); and Carmichael v. Southern Coal Co. (301 U. S. 495).

The enactment of the Social Security Act marked a new era, the Federal Government accepting, for the first time, responsibility for providing a systematic program of protection against economic and social hazards. Though admittedly not perfect or all inclusive, the social hazards. Though admittedly not perfect or all inclusive, the Social Security Act did embrace the broadest program for social social hazards. Though admittedly not perfect or all inclusive, the Social Security Act did embrace the broadest program for social security ever launched at one time by any government.

Relieving and reducing dependency: The Social Security Act aimed to attack the problem of insecurity upon two fronts: First, by providing safeguards designed to reduce future dependency, and second, by improving the methods of relieving existing needs. The first objective was promoted by providing a Federal system of old-age insurance and by granting Federal aid to State-administered programs of unemployment compensation; the second objective was promoted by providing Federal grants to State programs of aid to the needy aged, aid to dependent children, and aid to the needy blind. Funds were also provided to stimulate development and extension of various health and welfare services.

Public assistance: Under the Social Security Act great progress has already been made. As a result of the Federal aid provided in the Social Security Act, the States were enabled to extend their assistance programs to the needy aged, dependent children, and the needy blind. All the States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaii now have approved plans for old-age assistance and receive Federal funds to supplement their contributions. Forty States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii participate in the Federal-State program for aid to dependent children, and an equal number are receiving Federal grants for aid to the needy blind. Some 2,500,000 needy individuals are now receiving regular cash assistance under these convertive Federal State programs. receiving Federal grants for aid to the needy blind. Some 2,500,000 needy individuals are now receiving regular cash assistance under these cooperative Federal-State programs. From the beginning of the system through March 1939, over $1,177,000,000 of Federal, State, and local funds have been spent in States with plans approved by the Social Security Board. During the calendar year 1938 the total Federal, State, and local expenditures were over $495,000,000, of which $391,000,000 was for old-age assistance. $93,000,000 for aid to dependent children, and $11,000,000 for aid to Unemployment compensation: The incentives provided in the Social Security Act stimulated rapid passage of State unemployment compensation laws. Before the act was passed, only 1 State, Wisconsin, had a going system of unemployment insurance; now all the 48 States and Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia have approved laws. Benefits are already being paid to unemployed covered workers under all but two of these laws; the last two States (Illinois and Montana) will start benefit payments. States (Illinois and Montana) will start benefit payments on July 1 of this year. More than 27,500,000 workers are covered by these laws and about 3,800,000 temporarily unemployed workers received benefits amounting to nearly $400,000,000 during the year 1938. In addition, about $145,000,000 has been paid to unemployed workers during the first 4 months of 1939.

Old-age insurance: The full effect of the Federal old-age insurance program will not be felt until monthly benefits begin to be paid. In the meantime, however, the Social Security Board has established wage-record accounts for nearly 44,000,000 persons, of whom more than 32,000,000 have already had wages reported in either 1937 or 1938, thus enabling these individuals to build up rights to protection for themselves and their dependents upon a sound basis. In addition, lump-sum benefits, amounting to 3½ percent of accumulated covered earnings, totaling about $17,200,-000, have been paid up to April 30, 1839, to or on behalf of nearly 000, have been paid up to April 30, 1939, to or on behalf of nearly 345,000 who reached age 65 or died.

Revision of Social Security Act: Tremendous as is the scope of this program, it was recognized from the beginning that changes would have to be made as experience and study indicated lines of revision and improvement. Congress, therefore, expressly provided in the Social Security Act that the Social Security Board should study and make recommendations as to methods of providing more study and make recommendations as to methods of providing more effective economic security.

Further to facilitate necessary revision an Advisory Council on Social Security was created in May 1937. It was composed of outstanding citizens representing employers, employees, and the public. The Advisory Council spent more than a year in study and deliberation and transmitted its final report and recommendations on December 19, 1938.

The recommendations of the Social Security Board, based upon

The recommendations of the Social Security Board, based upon 3 years of intensive study, were submitted to the President of the United States on December 30, 1938. The President transmitted the Board's report to Congress, with a special message on January 16, 1939. The President's message and the Board's report were then 1939. The President's message and the Board's report were then referred to this committee.

The committee held extended public hearings on these recommendations and alternative proposals relating to social security, including more than 90 bills introduced in the House. These hearings lasted from February 1 to April 7, during which period the committee sat 48 days and took 2,500 pages of testimony. Among the 164 individuals who testified in person there were 3 Senators, 41 Congressmen, 14 Government officials (Federal and State), 21 labor representatives, 27 employer representatives, 16 economists, and 42 others representing themselves or various organized groups of citizens. Many of these witnesses filed supplementary statements for the record. Some 20 or 30 other statements from individuals unable to appear before the committee in person were also viduals unable to appear before the committee in person were also placed in the record.

Since the conclusion of the public hearings these various proposals have received the constant attention of the committee. Executive sessions have been held over a period of 6 weeks. The committee has realized the importance of this subject and has taken seriously its responsibility to recommend to Congress the best possible legislation for supplementing and improving our system of social security. The committee therefore recommends immediate enactment of this bill.

GENERAL PURPOSE AND SCOPE OF AMENDMENTS

The present bill aims to strengthen and extend the principles and objectives of the Social Security Act. The foundations of a permanent program have been laid, and it seems wise to build upon the present structure.

Old-age insurance, unemployment compensation, assistance are now accepted as permanent in our fabric of social services. The present bill is designed to widen the scope and to assistance are now accepted as permanent in our fabric of social services. The present bill is designed to widen the scope and to improve the adequacy and the administration of these programs without altering their essential features. Benefits will continue to be payable as a matter of right to workers covered by the insurance programs; aid will continue to be related to need under the assistance programs.

FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVOR INSURANCE BENEFITS

The number of aged persons in our population is steadily growing. In 1900 there were only 3,080,000 persons 65 and over, representing 4.1 percent of the population. This figure reached 6,634,000, or 5.4 percent, in 1930, and it is estimated there are about 8,200,000, or 6.3 percent, in 1930, and it is estimated there are about 8,200,000, or 6.3 percent, at the present time. Recent estimates indicate that by 1980 we may have over 22,000,000 persons aged 65 and over, representing 14 to 16 percent of the total population. Recognizing these facts, it is possible to foresee that we shall have a growing number of aged persons for whom some provision must be made. This has been the experience of all industrial countries.
